The Political Atmosphere in Washington—The Undercurrent of Talk—Coldness and Indifference by Congress Towards the Administration.

From Our Regular Correspondent.

WASHINGTON, Saturday, Feb. 19, 1870.

There is an element in the political atmosphere in Washington which bodes no good to the future unity and success of the Republican Party. It is difficult to define its character precisely, but it is so palpable that one can feel it and breathe it, and it is far more permeating than we like to admit. The cause of the existence of such an element is even more difficult to define than its character. But its existence is certain. The shape which this feeling takes may be illustrated, perhaps, by the remarks of a distinguished poet and satirist, who spent a few days here last week. He had been dining and wining in high official circles, had kept his eyes and ears open, and his conclusions were not hasty. On preparing to leave, a friend asked him, "Well, what do you find?" "I find," said he, "an Administration without a party to support it." The poet found the truth, and this remark may illustrate the element which I refer to as existing in this political atmosphere.

The Administration and the Republican Party in Congress are not en rapport in feeling or desire. There is no enthusiasm on the floor of either House either in the support of the measures of the Administration or in its defence from outside attack. This coldness and indifference extends so far that it is even possible for FERNANDO WOOD to obtain unanimous consent to offer and to pass impertinent resolutions reflecting more or less directly on the action of Departments, and that, too, upon mere newspaper assertion as a basis. A distinguished Senator, who, in all the vast volume of debate in that body has held a bridle on his tongue, said to me the other day on this subject: "There is not a member of that body who does not wish well to President GRANT and his Administration; yet there is not a particle of enthusiasm, and very little cordial feeling in its behalf in all the Senate." He is undoubtedly correct.

This condition of affairs is, of course, the undercurrent here, and not the surface aspect. But it is cropping out in so many directions that the matter may as well be seriously considered. It is a fact, then, that many men, who have heretofore acted with the Republican Party are now talking about new political affiliations. The Republican Party, in their estimation, has substantially fulfilled its mission in the suppression of the rebellion, the completion of reconstruction, and the establishment of impartial suffrage. Other issues are coming up in the near future, and new combinations must be made to meet them. They would prefer to remain with the Republican Party, but there is no inducement in the course of the Administration to do so, and they desire to be in the foreground of a new movement, provided there is to be one.

But the question will naturally be asked, "Who is to blame for this coolness and indifference between Congress and the Administration?" It would require a review of the reasons for, and interests involved in nearly every leading appointment yet made by the President, to answer this question fully. I say appointments, for it is a fact, however it may be disguised, that Congress is chiefly sore-headed over the offices. It is not the President's policy or course on any particular subject which is unsatisfactory. That is approved in the main. But the President, notwithstanding their best endeavors, has failed to learn that he must share the responsibility of his appointments with the members of Congress. He has made mistakes, and many of them have been made in yielding to this demand, and he shows no signs of conversion to this principle. He still retains the idea that somehow or other he is responsible at last, and he continues to act on that basis. Hence, you hear people predicting the disruption of the Republican Party. Hence, the fact that while the President has "no policy of his own to enforce against the will of the people," it is equally true that he has no power to enforce his own ideas upon the convictions of members of Congress. Thus it is that a single Senator, whose powers are potent for obstruction and pulling down, rather than for construction and building up, is able to lead the Senate by the nose into the position of totally refusing to take any new action on the very important question of the census, notwithstanding the fact that the President earnestly recommended it in his annual Message, and the further fact that for twenty years we have made no progress or change in legislation on this subject. Thus it is that the great national policy involved in the annexation of San Domingo is received silently and coldly, and allowed to become complicated with the derelictions of a past Administration, notwithstanding the fact that in this policy is involved, not the mere question of a naval station in the Gulf, but the entire control of the passages of the Caribbean Sea, the ultimate acquisition of Cuba from the sheer necessities of the position, and the control of the great Interoceanic Ship Canal across the Isthmus of Darien, certain to be an accomplished work within the next ten or fifteen years. What could be a grander foreign policy than this—all of which is contemplated in that little treaty, which is allowed to become the target of ridicule and falsehood, without a single senatorial voice to call attention to the sublime proportions of the policy of which it is only the preliminary indication.

I have said that Congress is sore-headed over the offices. They will deny it, of course. Let us analyze the situation a little, and see if it is not true. President GRANT's Administration is engaged in the very necessary but exceedingly disagreeable work of retrenchment and reform. It has this responsibility upon its shoulders, from which it cannot escape. It may be typified as an emetic to the body politic, and therefore agreeable to nobody, but certain to improve the condition of the patient. I should like to see the head of a Department who can be thoroughly popular among Congressmen if he has no places to give. The worthiest of Congressmen have a pressure upon them, largely the result of campaign obligations, which they cannot escape. It does not satisfy these who seek their influence that there are no vacancies. "Make them," is the reply. "What else are you here for?" is the unspoken inference. They can't be made, and double disappointment is the result. If we go up into the House we find members valiantly engaged in reducing the appropriations; this Department is cut down fifty thousand here and one hundred thousand there; clerks are lopped off in one direction, and contingencies in another. Take an instance: One Department was cut down $70,000 in the item for the pay of temporary clerks; "very well," said that Secretary; "but I will keep a register of how many applications for clerks I have from members of Congress." He had twelve the very next day, and I didn't look at the roster again. When members have thus done their duty to their constituents, by reducing the appropriations, they come down from the Capitol to the Departments and perform another duty in seeking appointments. They don't get them; they are disappointed; others are disappointed, and they have a settlement to make which is disagreeable. They are out of humor with themselves, and they blame the Administration. This illustration is an every day fact.

Now, what is to be done? As I have already said, some men are talking about new political affiliations—not alone because they are sore-headed in regard to GRANT, but because they think things tend towards new combinations. But here is President GRANT and his Administration. Despite all the sneers and criticisms as to its being a personal affair, it is a power and a presence, and will be for three years to come. Say what you will about bringing unknown men from obscurity into high position, they are able, honest and faithful, and they have no ties or obligations to stand in the way of the very disagreeable things which they have to perform. The President and his Administration are emphatically on the side of revenue reform. That is the great work which is intrusted to it, and the figures already show what has been done. What Republican member of Congress, of the score or more whom I have heard scolding and threatening during the past two weeks, proposes to be a candidate for re-election on any other platform than that? The duty of Congress is to stand by the Administration, and to that end its members must put personal griefs and petty considerations out of sight. CYMON.

The Gold Conspiracy—A Foreshadowing of Committee's Report—An Obscure Plank in the Democratic Platform Revealed—The Cadetship Investigation—Who Sold Them and Who Paid for Them.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20.—The report of the Banking and Currency Committee on the gold panic investigation will probably not be made until the last of the present week, it having been found impossible to prepare it sooner. Precisely what the report will be cannot be stated as yet. It will, of course, show how completely innocent the President and family were of all participation in and knowledge of the combination. Enough of the testimony found publicity during the investigation to render certain points pretty well established. Among the points thus shown are the fact that the organization of the movement, so far as it was organized at all, was in the hands of JAY GOULD alone from beginning to end. He let FISK in to help bear the burden before the crisis was over, and he let Mr. CORBIN in because the latter wanted to make some money, and GOULD proposed to make him useful in getting at the President. Among the important features is the fact that GOULD himself, in his evidence, repeatedly expressed his belief that the President had no connection, direct or indirect, with the matter, and no knowledge even of CORBIN's connection, except what might have been learned through the newspapers. GOULD stated before the Committee that he interested CORBIN to the extent of a million and a half of gold, half a million of which was sold out at a profit of twenty-five thousand dollars, for which CORBIN received his check. The other million never was sold, though CORBIN wanted to be let out when it showed a profit of ten per cent.; but GOULD declined. CORBIN explained away the disposition of this twenty-five thousand dollars by showing that he deposited it to his own credit in the Bank of America, to which he was a debtor by reason of a loan due to them on Government bonds, as collateral, which were bought at a 117, and which had declined materially. GOULD sought very hard to implicate BUTTERFIELD, and says he bought a million and a half of gold for him, but without orders or direction. He admitted also that BUTTERFIELD had from the first denied that any such order was ever given, and when BUTTERFIELD gave his evidence he put the denial on record in very emphatic terms. Both GOULD and CORBIN gave parole evidence before the Committee of the contents of the letter of Mrs. GRANT to Mrs. CORBIN. CORBIN said his letter to the President, which was carried by the messenger CHAPIN, never received any attention. When Mrs. GRANT's letter arrived, CORBIN became terribly frightened, and begged GOULD to let him out for his wife's sake, as well as his own, but Mr. GOULD was inexorable, and held CORBIN to the terms of the arrangement. CORBIN finally proposed to write to the President, stating that he had not a dollar interest in gold or bonds, and could therefore say impartially that if an order to sell gold was given it would be a great mistake. On Saturday night, Sept. 25, CORBIN, accompanied by his wife, came here to try and induce the President to reverse the order to sell, which was given the previous Friday. They returned on the Sunday night following, unsuccessful. CORBIN'S own testimony, it is said, is very damaging to himself. FISK's testimony is believed to be of very little account. The Committee could make very little of him. So far as the orders and transactions of the "Black Friday" are concerned, he and GOULD cross each other's statements very badly.

A PLANK IN THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

The debate in the Senate on Saturday on the question of subsidizing the Portland and Astoria Railroad by land grants, possesses some significance from the fact that it is almost the first definite party opposition which a measure of this character has evoked. The Republican members voted for it in a body, at least thirty-four of them who were present; while, of the seven Democrats present, all voted in the negative. The politicians here are inclined to attribute this action on the part of the Democrats, not so much to a feeling of hostility to the road as to a defined policy which has been set down on the subject of these land grants by the Democracy. It will be recollected that in the July Convention, in 1868, the Democrats inserted a plank in their platform which was lost sight of in the heated contest that followed, in which the position was taken that the public lands should be distributed as widely as possible among the people, and should be disposed of either under the Preemption or Homestead laws, or sold in reasonable quantities, and to none but actual occupants, at the minimum price established by the Government. When grants of the public lands may be allowed, necessary for the encouragement of important public improvements, the proceeds of the sale of such lands, and not the lands themselves, should be so applied. The wording of the resolution referred to covers the precise ground which Mr. THURMAN took in the debate.

THE SALE OF CADETSHIPS.

The cadet investigation has raised a great deal of smoke and not a little fire. Cases involving ex-members and present members of Congress, to the number of eight or ten, seem to have been certainly established. There will be an effort made to-morrow morning, in the Military Committee, to report at once to the House the names of those members who are inculpated, and ask for immediate action. That action involves expulsion as the only form of punishment which can be administered. The members of the present House, against whom proof of the sale of their cadetships has been obtained, are said to be B. F. WHITEMORE, of South Carolina; JOHN T. DEWEESE, of North Carolina; and B. B. BUTLER, of Tennessee. It is said that one or two more, including a quite prominent Democratic member from the West, are likely to be caught by the evidence yet to be taken. WHITEMORE's cadetship was sold for $2,000, and the money sent into his district to defray election expenses, and he says he never received any of it. He at first denied the transaction entirely, but the proof has been too strong, and he now admits it, but says he got none of the money. DEWEESE, of North Carolina, sold his appointment outright. BUTLER, who appeared before the Committee yesterday, says that he never considered that there was anything improper in the part he took in his cadetship. His story as he tells it is substantially as follows: He made an appointment, and his candidate was rejected. General SCHOFIELD, then Secretary of War, was very anxious to secure the appointment of a son of General TYLER. Colonel BUTLER said he had no objection whatever. There were no boys in his district who had acquirements sufficient to enable them to pass an examination. General ESTE called on him (BUTLER) one day at the House, and said that he felt interested in the appointment of young TYLER, and that his father would do something to help them in the approaching canvass in the State. Mr. BUTLER said he would make the appointment, which he accordingly did. ESTE offered him $900 for the election, which he declined to take on the ground that there was no local organization there at the time, the canvass not having assumed shape. Subsequently, however, the money came into BUTLER's possession, and was distributed as follows: $500 to the State Journal, newspaper, at Nashville; $280 to the Era; $100 to the Flag, and $20 expended in tickets. Mr. BUTLER says he should have made the appointment without any money whatever, and was not at the time aware that there was a statute providing that the appointment should be made from among the residents of the Congressional District. Of ex-members against whom offences of this character have been proven there are: JOHN B. CALLIS, member of the Fortieth Congress from Alabama; W. J. BLACKBURN, of the Fortieth Congress, from Louisiana; S. NEWTON PETTIS, of the Fortieth Congress, from Pennsylvania, and two or three more, against whom negotiations which were not consummated are proven.

RESIGNATION.

Among the resignations received at the Internal Revenue Bureau is that of JOHN CRANE, Esq., Collector for the Fifth North Carolina District. Colonel CRANE has proven one of the most efficient officers of the revenue in the South. The year prior to his appointment the district only paid about $100,000. Since his appointment the receipts have averaged half a million per annum, and the district was made the largest tax-paying district in the State.

REBEL LEGISLATION IN MONTANA.

A delegation of Republicans from Montana have arrived here for the purpose of securing Congressional disapproval of certain acts of the late rebel Legislature, whereby that portion of the salaries of the Republican officials of that Territory, which is paid by the Territory has been cut off. In this they will probably be successful, as the Montana Legislature is not in very good odor with Congress.

SOUTHERN DISABILITIES.

The Disability bill of the House Reconstruction Committee does not appear to meet with much favor from a certain class of the Southern people who took part in the late rebellion, and who may be considered as standing on the highest political level. It is argued against the bill that the processes and details of it are so tedious and so unsatisfactory, requiring, as they do, sketches of personal and family history, that a large number of those whom it would be desirable to see again in political life, and, in a measure, prominently leading in the new political regeneration of the South, will not seek to avail themselves of whatever advantages it may offer, and that the only parties who will be really benefited by it belong mainly to that class who, some years ago, visited this city, and after the judicious expenditure of some dollars in our hotel bars, went home with pardons in their pockets. What is advocated is a broad, general measure, removing disabilities of all descriptions. The passage of such a law would, it is claimed, be far more effectual, and tend more towards the restoration of fraternal feeling, than any of those peddling measures the quality and the quantity of which are alike strained and ungracious.

THE BRITISH MAN-OF-WAR MONARCH.

The official visit to the British ironclad Monarch by the President and Cabinet will probably take place on Friday next. Secretary ROBESON, who went over to Annapolis on Friday evening to receive Captain COMMERELL and his officers, returned last evening, accompanied by Captain COMMERELL, Captain WARD and Mr. LE FANE, of the English Legation, and Governor CHAMBERLAIN, of Maine. The Secretary dined a number of prominent gentlemen this evening, including the latter.

ILLNESS OF ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

Admiral FARRAGUT, who arrived here last week to attend the meeting of the trustees of the Peabody Educational Fund, was suddenly taken so ill that he was unable to attend the deliberations of the body, and he has been, up to the present time, confined to his room. The friends of the Admiral will be glad to learn that he has so much improved as to enable him to be out in a few days. He is at the Arlington.

A PARTY AT GENERAL BELKNAP'S.

Among the social festivities last evening was the second card reception of Secretary and Mrs. BELKNAP, which was attended by a very brilliant company. Among the distinguished ladies present were Lady OUSELEY, wife of Sir WM. GORE OUSELEY, and Mrs. General MCCLELLAN and her mother, and Mrs. General MARCY. There was also a large reunion of New-Yorkers, in and out of Congress, at the hospitable residence of Hon DENNIS MCCARTHY, who, with his family, have added largely to the social enjoyments of Washington during the past three months.

PERSONAL.

Governor CHAMBERLAIN, of Maine, who accompanied Captain COMMERELL, of the Monarch, on the voyage from Portland to Annapolis, arrived in the city last evening, and is stopping at the Jenness House. The Governor meets here his former Lieutenant-Colonel of the Twentieth Maine, Major-General AMES, now United States Senator elect from the State of Mississippi. Governor CHAMBERLAIN will be remembered as not less renowned in war than in civil life. It was his gallant division upon which was conferred the distinguished honor of receiving at Appomattox Court House the formal surrender or actually laying down of arms of LEE's army. The Governor says the voyage of the Monarch was an excellent experience of rough sea weather, and that she is a noble ship in every respect.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

THE RANCHO VISITACION CASE.

The action of Attorney-General HOAR, in directing, at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, the District-Attorney of California to use the name of the United States for a private individual to vacate the patent issued to the owners of Rancho Visitacion Guadaloupe Rodeo Viago, has caused much commotion among California landholders now here, and American and European capitalists holding lands in California under United States patents. Messrs. PIOCHE and BAYERQUE, representing the foreign owners of these lands, who have bought and sold under this United States patent since 1864 to the amount of many millions of dollars, have presented to the Attorney-General, through their counsel, EDWARD L. GOOLD, Esq., a brief, which concludes by stating that the Acting Attorney-General's order to Mr. LATIMER, District-Attorney for California, should be withdrawn. Mr. GOOLD's brief has been referred to the Secretary of the Interior. If the Attorney-General's order shall not be withdrawn immediate steps will be taken in Congress to stop its action, which, it is claimed, if persisted in, will withdraw all foreign capital from lands in California, invested on the faith of a United States patent, and will cause broadspread destruction in the State. The Visitacion Rancho lies mostly within the city limits of San Francisco, and has hundreds of owners. It contains about 5,000 acres, and is worth many millions of dollars.

METRICAL WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, of the Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures, will, when an opportunity shall occur, call up his bill to promote the establishment of an international metrical system of coinage, as follows:

Whereas, Certain nations of Europe have adopted and have proposed to the rest of the world a coinage which was originally based upon that system of weights known as metrical, but which, under the influence of circumstances, has departed from its intended character; and whereas, there is an assured expectation that this character of simple relationship to metrical weights will be ultimately returned to; and whereas, the coinage of the United States can be brought into exact conformity with metrical weights by a change in its value, amounting to less than one-third of one per centum in the case of gold coins; therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the gold hereafter carried by the United States shall contain for each dollar of denominational value, one and one-half grains of pure gold, and shall weigh for each dollar, one and two-thirds grains, the proportion of alloy being thus kept as one to ten; and that such coins shall have stamped upon them, in addition to other devices, their weight in grains, and the inscription, nine-tenths fine.

A CONGRESSIONAL TEMPERANCE PLEDGE.

Senator WILSON has received numerous letters asking for the form of the temperance pledge, which the Congressional Temperance Society propose shall be administered throughout the country on the 22d day of February of the present year. It is as follows:

"We, the undersigned, do pledge our truth, faith and honor that we will not use intoxicating liquors as a beverage nor traffic in them, that we will not furnish them as an article of entertainment or for persons in our employment, and that in all suitable ways we will discountenance their use."

A SNOW STORM.

A snow storm of several hours' duration prevailed here this afternoon. The weather to-night is cold and wintry.

RELAPSING FEVER.

Two cases of relapsing fever occurred in Washington within the past week in crowded tenements.

OUR COMMERCE.

A Report from the Tonnage Division, Treasury Department—Decadence of our Shipping.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20.—The report of JOSEPH NIMMO, Jr., to the Secretary of the Treasury on "Foreign Commerce and Decadence of American Shipping," has just been printed. Mr. NIMMO is chief of the tonnage division of the Treasury Department. Among many things, he says: "The two charts (Nos. 19 and 20) indicate, the one by the line of total tonnage entered, and the other by the line of total imports, that our foreign commerce has been subject to frequent and violent fluctuations, and that during the last four years it has been larger than ever before in the history of our country. Our misfortune is simply this: British ships have superseded American ships, not only in the international commerce of the world, but also to a very great degree in our own trade with foreign nations. The supersedure of American by British ships is exhibited by charts one to two inclusive, being summaries of which are as follows:

The following is a comparative statement showing the decadence of American shipping at the ports of Boston, New-York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New-Orleans and San Francisco, (charts Nos. 1 to 6 inclusive:)

PER CENT. OF TOTAL TONNAGE ENTERED IN AMERICAN AND FOREIGN VESSELS.

	—1856 to 1861 inclu.—		—1862 to 1865 inclu.—
	American vessels.	Foreign vessels.	American vessels.	Foreign vessels.
Boston	69	30	30	70
New-York	74	26	36	64
Philadelphia	83	17	57	43
Baltimore	79	21	49	51
New-Orleans	74	26	43	57
San Francisco	75	25	73	29

While the building of ships and barks, which are employed chiefly in the foreign trade, fell from 373 in the year 1855 to 91 in the year 1869, the building of schooners, which are generally employed in the coasting trade, is quite as prosperous as it was from 1855 to 1860.

The falling off in the building of large vessels is further illustrated as follows: During the five years from 1853 to 1858, sixty-five per cent. of our total seagoing tonnage, built on the coast, consisted of ships and barks; while during the five years from 1863 to 1868 only twenty-eight per cent. consisted of ships and barks. During the year 1855 the most prosperous year in the history of American shipbuilding, there were 305 ships and barks and 173 schooners built in the New-England States, the aggregate tonnage built having been 326,429 tons; while during the year ending June 30, 1869, there were 72 ships and barks, and 185 schooners built, the aggregate tonnage having been 92,150 tons. It is ascertained, moreover, that the average tonnage of ships and barks built since the war has fallen off ten per cent. The difference between the numerical expressions of tonnage under the old and new methods of admeasurement does not materially effect these results. Brigs, schooners and sloops measure numerically less under the new than under the old admeasurement, while ships, barks, steamboats and vessels having closed-in spaces above their hulls, have their tonnage largely increased. The aggregate tonnage of the country under the new admeasurement is about five per cent. less than under the old. Mr. NIMMO's report occupies sixty-two pages of printed matter. He concludes as follows:

At this day when ocean steam navigation is highly advanced and is rapidly superseding the use of sailing vessels between all the large commercial ports of the globe, let us see to it that we no longer suffer the loss of the profits of our own commerce and the burning disgrace of being obliged to subsidise foreign steam lines for the carriage of our own mails. No measures for fostering our commercial marine can be effective which do not clearly recognise the fact, that at this day a prosperous steam marine is the necessity of the maritime interests of the nation. This is an important epoch in the history of commerce. By means of the Suez Canal our trade with the East Indies will probably be greatly increased. We are also at this time especially interested in that great international project, the Darien Ship Canal, which, when completed like the Suez Canal, will tend greatly to the development of steam navigation. To hesitate now is to surrender entirely. Let us rebuild our merchant navy. Let the flag of the United States again be seen in all the large ports of the world, at the masthead of our merchant ships, those messengers of peace, and we shall need but little display of the war power abroad in order to maintain the national honor, or to protect the rights of American citizens. At this time of our commercial decline let us emulate the brave example of our old maritime rival, when, twenty years ago, she saw the international shipping of the world rapidly passing into our hands. Her course at that important crisis of her history is thus described by Hon. FREEMAN H. MORSE, United States Consul at London, in a dispatch to the State Department, Ex. Doc. No. 283, Fortieth Congress: 'Comprehending her position, she clearly foresaw the absolute necessity of great, prompt and persevering efforts to recover and maintain her maritime prestige, or she might almost calculate the time when her lead on the ocean would pass permanently to other hands. She, therefore, went into a more close and thorough investigation, practical and theoretical, of the whole question of her commercial future, and without delay set about the application of such remedies as the nature of the case seemed to require. She made no serious attempt to revive restrictions on foreign commerce, but sought to obtain advantages for her own by great improvements in the models and construction of her ships, by removing as far as practicable all burdens from them, and by giving them the encouragement which favorable legislation can afford. The whole nation watched its commercial marine with care and anxiety, for it contained the ark of their safety, and to it encouragement performed its duty of guardian and protector with more vigilance, perhaps, than ever before. The Government Board of Trade, the local boards, Parliamentary committees, intelligent merchants, shipbuilders, engineers and men of commercial knowledge all contributed their quotas of information, and thought to unfold its defalencies and remedies, while the representatives of the Government in foreign countries explored the resources of the countries to which they were accredited, and how English trade could be expanded thereinto. Before the first effects manifested in England be felt by the people of the United States, and we shall, within a few years, retrieve our fallen fortunes upon the ocean. It must not be that the sight of the men to whom we mainly attribute our marine disasters shall continue to suspend the American flag in our own ports, and bear off from us the prize of our own commerce with other nations. Let the first step be that line of policy which the President indicated in his inaugural address, 'a prosperous commerce is to be rebuilt.'"

THE GREENWALDTH TRAGEDY.

Additional Correspondence from the State Department—Statement of the French Consul-General—Action of the Spanish Authorities—Nationality of Greenwaldth.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20.—Just before the adjournment of the House on Saturday the Speaker laid before that body a communication from the Secretary of State with further correspondence upon the recent assassination of GREENWALDTH and the wounding of his companions in Havana. Amongst the papers is an affidavit by WELLS, in which, after giving the particulars of the assault, he says:

"I had not the remotest idea of having committed any offence against any one, but since the affair I have learned that the fact of my three companions having on blue neckties was the probable cause of the assault."

The following is a translation of the document from the Political Secretary also contained in this correspondence:

SUPERIOR POLITICAL GOVERNMENT, }
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY. }

Yesterday, at 12 o'clock noon, in passing by the park opposite to the Louvre Coffee House, Messrs. ISAAC GREENWALDTH, HUGH JOHNSON, THOMAS K. FOSTER and GARDNER WELLS, foreigners, met a white man, tall and thin, with buff colored pantaloons and vest, black frock coat and Jipisapa hat, i. e., a hat made in Jipisapa, Ecuador, who, seizing the blue cravat worn by the last mentioned of the above-named persons, took it from his person, expressing himself in terms which he (the person attacked) could not understand on account of not knowing the language, and when they attempted to move on, the unknown man drew a revolver and fired at the aforesaid foreigners, in consequence of which Mr. ISAAC GREENWALDTH expired a few moments afterwards. In view of this lamentable occurrence, and in order to aid the immediate action of the tribunals, his Excellency, the Superior Political Governor, has determined to offer a reward of $1,000 to whoever shall deliver up the unknown aggressor, whose description has been given, with proofs of his identity, ordering, at the same time, that this notice be published in all the newspapers for general information.

HAVANA, Feb. 7, 1870.—In his letter, covering the declaration of the French Consul-General, Mr. HALL compliments that gentleman highly, and attributes the safety of FOSTER to the courageous interference of MARQUIS ZORRIN ZAMBON. The declaration of this gentleman is a faithful and interesting account of the affair, and is given entire, as follows:

"On Saturday, Feb. 5, I left the Hotel de Telegraphe a little before noon. I got into my carriage in order to go to the office of the Consulate, where I was to preside at the annual meeting of the French Benevolent Society. After having met the carriage of the Consul-General of England, which was taking Mrs. DUNLOP and her daughter to the hotel, and being near the promenade called Paseo de Isabel Catolica, on a line with the street called Tenient Rey, I distinctly heard several shots of firearms. I ordered my coachman to stop, and turning my eyes towards the promenade in the direction whence came the noise, I perceived a man running at full speed and two persons pursuing him. The fugitive was overtaken and seized. I saw a shot fired at him; the muzzle of the weapon almost touched his head; and a moment after I saw him struck behind, between the shoulders, as it seemed to me. This took place less than one hundred paces from the spot where I was, and in less time than I require to write it. The unfortunate man had, however, escaped from the hands of his aggressors, and was running towards my carriage. Seeing that he was near enough, I made him a sign, called to him, and told him to get into the carriage with me. I saw him when but a few steps from me. He was a young man about 25 years of age, wearing cloth garments, and having a very florid complexion. His hands were covered with blood; he staggered as if ready to fall; he did not utter a single word; he seemed to make an effort to come to me, but at the sight of his assassins he turned aside and went in the direction of the arsenal. My coachman has since told me that he saw him fall or disappear against the paling which separates the promenade from the American Railway. At the same moment the two aggressors appeared before me with a bold and threatening air; one of them wore a brown surtout, and I could not distinguish his features. The other was quite a tall man who was nearer to me, wore a straw hat with a cockade like those of the volunteers. He seemed in no wise excited by what he had just done and was coolly cleaning a large stiletto which I saw gleaming in his hand. "Gentlemen," exclaimed I in Spanish, "what is the matter? What is this? Why treat this unfortunate man thus?" "He is a scoundrel," replied the man with the stiletto; "he is a villain and a rascal." "But," said I, "for what do you accuse him? There must be some reason for all this. What has he done? What has he done?" "He has shouted 'viva CESPEDES,' he wears an American cravat; he and many others deserve what has happened to him." "But," rejoined I, "it is not customary to kill people for that; for such things they are taken to prison and delivered up to justice." I did not yet know that the victim was an inoffensive foreigner, without arms, defenceless, and not even able to explain himself. I supposed him to be a native of the country. The time consumed by these questions and answers had enabled him to escape and conceal himself. All discussion with the assassins was useless; their attitude was menacing. We retired. I went to the Consulate, where the French citizens were awaiting my arrival, and shortly after I made a report to his Excellency the Captain-General of the facts of which I had just been a witness. On returning to the hotel I learned that another foreigner had about the same time been pursued by a crowd as far as the corner of the Placide Vegeur, stabbed and horribly wounded, and that he had expired at the door of the Commission, whither the Police had carried him without having tried to defend him. I have made this statement, which accords in all particulars with my remembrance, at the request of Mr. HALL, Vice-Consul-General of the United States, in order to serve him as is just and proper. (Signed,)

M. DE ZORBIN ZANSON, French Consul.

On the 17th inst. Secretary FISH telegraphed to the Consul-General of the North German Union at New-York, making inquiries as to the nationality of GREENWALDTH, and on the same day received the following reply: "Mother and father-in-law pretend that he is an American citizen, but cannot produce papers nor indicate when he was naturalized. His employers deny this, and assert that he did a Cuban subject." The Consul-General sent another telegram on same day, saying: "GREENWALDTH, who had changed his name from GRUENWALD, got a passport from the Hessian Consul Jan 5, 1869, on the face of an affidavit made the same day that he was a subject of the Duchy of Hesse. This passport was renewed by the same Consul, Dec. 13, 1869. GREENWALDTH presented himself with the old paper without mentioning any change in his status. The latter passport was given, however, by mistake, as it has since turned out that he belonged to that part of the Grand Duchy which forms a part of the North German Union, and for which the undersigned officiates. I am making inquiries as to whether GREENWALDTH had taken steps to acquire American citizenship.

(Signed,) JOHANNES ROSING."

The correspondence sent in closes with a telegram from Secretary FISH to Messrs. LANMAN & KEMP, saying that GREENWALDTH went to Cuba a German, and their reply, acknowledging that he was a German, and took a Hessian passport out with him.

Destruction of the Kossuth House, Nashville—Losses in Baltimore.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., Feb. 20.—The Kossuth House, on Market-street, was burned about 3 o'clock this morning. The fire originated in the dining room on the first floor, and was not discovered until all means of egress, except by the windows of the upper story were cut off. The inmates of the house had to save themselves by jumping from the second floor. One little boy is thought to have perished in the flames. The hotel and contents were destroyed. A store adjoining was also burnt, but the goods were saved. The loss was about $30,000, which is fully covered by insurance. The fire was the work of an incendiary.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 20.—The picture-frame manufactory of J. W. BUTLER & Co., in South Baltimore-street, was damaged by fire yesterday to the amount of $20,000. Three buildings were almost entirely consumed. The loss on machinery is covered by a policy in a Washington company.

Attempt to Poison a Family—Confession in a Dream.

HARTFORD, Conn., Feb. 20.—SAMUEL BREWER, of this city, complained to the Police a day or two ago, that his stepson, GEORGE BILLINGS, had attempted to poison the family by putting something in their tea. No poison was found in the tea not used, and no one was made so sick as to need a physician. BILLINGS has been questioned by the Police, and he said BREWER persecuted him to make him leave home and abandon some property under his guardianship. Yesterday BREWER claimed that he slept with the young man the night before, and that he confessed his poisoning attempt in his sleep. BILLINGS is missing to-day.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE HISTORY OF ROME. By THEODOR MOMMSEN. Translated with the author's sanction, and additions by Rev. WILLIAM P. DICKSON, D. D.; with a preface by Dr. LEONHARD SCHMITZ. New edition, in four volumes. Volume I. New-York: CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co., No. 654 Broadway. 1869.

In reproducing in America Dr. DICKSON'S translation of MOMMSEN'S Roman History, Messrs. SCRIBNER have done a very important service to the cause of education in the country. This and MAX MULLER'S Chips are the most important philological works issued among us for a long time.

It would be superfluous at this late day to say anything in praise of a work which has obtained, both in Germany and England, the highest encomiums from all persons competent to form a true judgment regarding it. It embraces the history of Italy from the earliest times down to the fall of the Republic, and when we say it is the best history existing of that period we give but a very meagre idea of its merits. It has all the recommendations of a good history. In the first place, it is well written. The style is easy, free, and, unlike that of most German historical works, very little involved. It is lively, and continually makes the reader feel how real and tangible a thing Roman history and life must be to Dr. MOMMSEN. The characters live and act from intelligent and intelligible motives; the events take place, not by accident, as if the gods were subject to fits of ill or good temper, but on account of causes which we can see and understand. In MOMMSEN'S hands the history of Rome becomes as interesting as one of SPIELHAGEN'S novels. If the story is a tragedy, he is not to blame for that; it has its comical sides.

Dr. MOMMSEN, by reason of his researches, undertaken under the auspices of the Prussian Government, into the ancient inscriptions of Italy, was in a better position to write a Roman history than any other person well could be. He has been able to bring forward a large number of new facts, thus to settle many questions that previously were doubtful, and then to present whole series of facts in an entirely new light. But Dr. MOMMSEN had other advantages not enjoyed by any of his predecessors for writing such a history. He enjoyed all the benefits to be derived from the modern science of historical criticism. Facts have been sifted, classified and made to yield their legitimate deductions. The science of language in particular has contributed much important matter, and this no one has ever shown himself more capable of handling than Dr. MONOMSEN. Ready to receive every etymological result properly obtained, he never allows himself to be carried away by fanciful theories or specious arguments. He seldom takes a step, even in the way of conjecture, beyond his actual knowledge. In this respect he forms a remarkable contrast to MAX MULLER. The science of language has made great progress since the first chapters of this history were written, and we doubt not, if the author were now to rewrite them, he would find in that science a considerable number of results worthy of his attention.

Dr. MOMMSEN'S work is emphatically a history of the Roman people, not a history of their rulers and wars. It leaves no sphere of Roman action out of view. It is divided into books of which there are five, and each of these again is subdivided into chapters. In each book, besides the chapters devoted to events, we have chapters on law, religion, agriculture, commerce, warfare, art, literature, science, education, and the like, so that we are enabled to see the Roman, not merely as a soldier, wearing the sagum, but as a citizen in all the relations of life, from childhood to old age.

Like all the historians of the critical school, Dr. MOMMSEN puts little faith in the legendary history of early Rome. Indeed he almost ignores the Kings and their doings. At the same time he gives very full information in regard to the ethnology of the founders of Rome, and of the races of Italy—Japygians, Latins, Etruscans and Hellenes. The chapter on the Etruscans in particular will be found interesting.

Any one who derives his ideas of early Roman history from the ordinary works on the subject, will find these ideas sadly blurred after he has made himself acquainted with MOMMSEN. Without allowing himself to be blinded by the authority of antiquity like the pedantic scholars of last century, or by dogmas of any philosophic system, like the Hegelian historian of Rome, SCHWEGLER, Dr. MOMMSEN has asked himself, What do we really know of Roman history? His work is an attempt, and a very successful one, to answer this question.

We have before us the original German of Dr. MOMMSEN—the first English edition of Dr. DICKSON'S translation—very inelegantly printed and bound, the recent English library edition—a very handsome work in every respect—and the American edition of Vol. I. issued by Messrs. SCRIBNER. Of these, the recent English edition is the best. The American edition, though apparently a reprint from this, contains a considerable number of typographical mistakes, for which the American editor is responsible. For example, it is pretty funny to be told that hufe means "hide, as much as can be properly tilled with one plough," p. 133. However, there are spots in the sun, and we do not wish to find fault with Messrs. SCRIBNER. They have given us a very neat and serviceable edition of the best Roman history, taken all in all, that has hitherto been written.

ABDALLAH. By RENE LEFEBRE-LABOULAYE. Translated by MARY L. BOOTH. New-York: SCRIBNER, WELFORD & CO.

The region which furnishes the locality for this pretty story is one fertile of interest to all who delight in glitterings and brilliant imagery of the East, and who are young enough in heart to find in its language an expression of their own impulse. Abdallah is an Arabian tale, designed at once to please the fancy and improve the heart. It enlightens us likewise concerning Asiatic manners and characteristics, the general features of which show little or no change between the present and the far-off past. The writer has happily succeeded in so clothing his ideas and language in the complete costume of the East, that he appeals to the imagination of the young, for whom romance has always a fascination, while at the same time older heads will not be found to be proof against its allurements. The narrative, which represents the perpetual struggle between good and evil, is gracefully rendered and very interesting; and the moral, which is rather suggested that enforced, will have a tendency to foster in the growing mind a love for what is good. This doubtless was the purpose of the distinguished lawyer and critic, who employed the few leisure hours he could snatch from graver studies to weave fanciful and picturesque forms wherein to embody abstract truths. Miss BOOTH'S translation is, as usual, excellent.

New Magazines.

—It is not easy to penetrate the secret of youthful sympathies, and to capture and hold them fast. In the current number of Our Young Folks, Mr. PARTON, who writes an interesting account of Captain LACAROTES' famous voyage, seems admirably adapted to succeed in the task, and Mr. MCENTEE, in the paper entitled "Mick Bluejacket's Dutch Boat," is no less fortunate in his endeavors. Mr. TROWBRIDGE has wisely judged that the youth of the country should acquire at least a slight knowledge of the outward details of our own Government, and he has therefore given them a brief sketch of the duties of those who represent the people as well as those who fill the most responsible offices, together with a minute description of the Capitol and Halls of Legislature. The dream of the little girl serves prettily to illustrate an old and thrifty adage, and will appeal to the fancy of childhood. The wonders of the animal kingdom have a rare fascination for boys and girls, and Mr. HIGGINSON, in his chapter on elephants, has done much to instruct and gratify them. There are likewise several other interesting papers.

—That excellent magazine, Hours at Home, seems to be held within its somewhat limited dimensions simply by the avoidance of padding, for it certainly contains as many really valuable papers as some monthlies of twice its size. The first article in the present number treats an old subject, the Ancient Roman, with a freshness that seems to renew his youth. A glimpse of poor THACKERAY is as pleasant as such melancholy reminiscences can be, resembling as they do those old photographs which recall at once to our accustomed eyes the image of our friend, but utterly fail to enable a stranger to conceive of that friend as he stood in the flesh. "Men and beasts" is a discussion of the ever perplexing subject of the intelligence of animals. Such a chapter is interesting to people fond of handling riddles which are of metaphysical aspect, and admit of no solution. Mr. SCHELE DE VERE'S account of certain "Strange Wanderers" is charmingly written, though it contains some statements we would rather not believe. Such, for instance, as the narrative of the tortures inflicted on the reindeer by the midges, who seem to carry their customs from the Adirondacks into higher latitudes. Mrs. CRAIK'S story maintains its even excellence, and several other able contributions make up the number.

—ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S "Vicar of Bullhampton" heads the list of attractive papers which render Lippincott for March a particularly acceptable number. "Jim Lane" is one of the most remarkable biographical sketches we have met with for many a day, and that the subject of it was an exceptional and anomalous personage appears from the following:

"In the midst of Christians he had been carefully educated for the Church; among scoffers religion was but a cloak for hypocrisy. In Kansas he wore the fells of wild beasts; in Boston he appeared in black broadcloth and white cravat, and whined through his nose as religiously as the melodeon of a country parsonage. Among New-Englanders, his mother was a 'Connecticut schoolmarm;' with Southerners, he was a Kentuckian; among Western men, a Hoosier; and thus it was his real origin was as great a mystery as the source of the Nile."

The wish of the writer who predicts "The Coming Revolution in England" is evidently "father to the thought;" the value of his prophetic gifts time will show. "The Stranger in Nahant" is an interesting sketch. "Marble Fauning," a fantastic little story, is followed by a well authenticated account of the Vaudoux in St. Domingo. It discloses a terrible picture of idolatrous rites, serpent worship, and human sacrifices, which at the present day almost pass belief. The chapter "Concerning Shelley" shows the force of example, either for good or ill, and leads us wonderingly to ask who next of our buried poets will be brought before the bar of public opinion, that his imperfections may undergo investigation, and all the dead scandals concerning him may be reanimated. "Errors of the Press" is a sparkling little paper, and that the article on "Governmental Interference with the Gold Premium" is written by AMASA WALKER, is warrant for its being worthy of respectful attention.

— There is much of solid excellence in the March number of Old and New. The number may, indeed, be a thought too heavy, but of the merit of many of the papers there can be no question. Among the contributors are Henry James, President G. M. Steele, Paul H. Hayne, Sidney Andrews, A. D. Mayo, Julia C. R. Dorr, J. H. Trumbull, Washington Gladden, T. W. Parsons, "Fred. Ingham" and others. The departments towards the end, called respectively "The Examiner" and "Record of Progress," are carefully prepared, and the magazine is beautifully printed. There seems to us to be room for such a publication as Old and New, and the projectors have clearly shown they can command the ability to insure its being kept regularly at its present high standard.

The New-Hampshire Campaign—Letter from Congressman Dawes.

Hon. HENRY L. DAWES, of Massachusetts, has written the following reply to a letter from the New-Hampshire delegation in Congress, requesting him to speak in that State during the present political campaign:

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15, 1870.

GENTLEMEN: Your favor of the 14th inst. was received this morning. I have received a telegram from E. H. ROLLINS, Chairman of your State Republican Committee, containing an invitation to canvass your State before the approaching election, to which I have replied.

While I am grateful for the kind terms in which you have been pleased to concur in this invitation to me, and for the personal friendship and confidence which mark your communication, I feel that I have no right to appropriate your flattering estimate of my public services. My participation in public affairs has extended over a period crowded with great events and distinguished by great national vicissitudes.

While I have been permitted and privileged to take in the human instrumentality called to the work, is before the country for its judgment. I may be permitted to say in all frankness that that part, however unimportant, is so interwoven with the growth and prosperity of the Republican Party, that you have a right to invoke my assistance in vindicating its integrity and maintaining the supremacy in a State so distinguished as New-Hampshire for loyalty in war and stability in peace.

If I am correctly informed in relation to the political canvass in your State, you have especial claim to my services, growing out of recent events here in which I have participated. Your communication alludes to the fact, which has been pressed from other sources, that the enemies of the Republican Party have sought to identify recent efforts of mine to induce economy in public expenditures with hostility to the great patriotic organization with which I have been associated since its birth. I need hardly say to you, who know me so well, that my whole public life has been devoted to the principles of the Republican Party, and that I have endeavored to uphold them, through good and evil report, with a sincerity and confidence which has suffered no abatement during the administration of President GRANT. I am proud to belong to a party which will bear self-criticism and grow healthy and strong by self-probity. In the permanent supremacy of that party alone can I see the safe solution of the great questions of reconstruction, finance and taxation which have been bequeathed to the country by the demolishing of the rebellion, and through it only can be secured that fidelity in the collection and economy in the disbursement of the public revenues, which alone will liquidate the public debt and lighten the public burdens. I cannot hesitate, therefore, however inconvenient, to lend my voice and influence to win a victory for the gallant Republicans of New-Hampshire in their coming struggle.

The principles and policy we contend for must be upheld in State organizations as well as national. They are the same everywhere. We cannot ignore at home any more than in national politics, the hostility of the Democratic party to the progress of those liberal principles which have animated the party to which we belong in their opposition to measures which uphold a public faith white they strengthen the public credit. Nor can we question the fact that whatever tends to weaken the integrity and unity of the Republican organization at home, however specious and attractive the guise it may wear, or the name it may assume, not only strikes a blow directly or indirectly at the permanent welfare of the State, but undermines all healthful administration of national affairs. Independent political organizations in State politics, necessarily antagonistic, whenever they exist, weaken the whole power of the Republican Party in the nation to elevate and [illegible] labor, secure its rights and [illegible] power. [illegible] good [illegible] will [illegible] Democratic party, whose whole history for [illegible] years has been a record of [illegible] for the special promotion of which these independent associations are now put forward as champions. With these sentiments of faith in the Republican Party, and its patriotic administration of public affairs, and distrust of whatever seeks or tends to impair its power and influence, I shall take pleasure in devoting to your canvass such time and strength as my public duties will permit. I am, with sincere respect and esteem, Yours truly, H. L. DAWES.

To Hon. Messrs. Cragin, Patterson, Eia, Stevens and Benton, of New-Hampshire.

The Providence Herald, the leading Democratic paper in Rhode Island, with all the force of double leads and italics urges the Democrats of that State to organize now for the Spring campaign, refusing all affiliations with the factions and cliques of other parties, and never to rest in their labors until the State is redeemed. If they fail this year, it says, they must try again next year.

Senator HENDRICKS told the Democrats of New-Orleans in a speech last week that they had no cause to entertain prejudices against the negro,—that the negro of his own notion is not going to ask for social equality or for social rights, and now that he is to become a voter they must use their "personal influence" to induce him to vote with them, who had been such very kind and considerate friends to him in the days of his bondage.

In a letter to a Georgian, Senator LEWIS, of Virginia, says: "The only information I have is gleaned from the newspapers, and if their statements be correct, I fear Georgia has acted badly—that is, she has not acted in entire good faith with the country. This is the opinion of the President, who has certainly acted very leniently, and who ardently desires peace and harmony throughout the entire country. But for the troubles in your State, Virginia would have been admitted, without conditions, during the first days of the session."

The Line and Staff Dispute—Letter from a Staff Officer—Objections to the Suggestions of "A Line Officer."

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

I have read the letter of "A Line Officer" of the Army of the 16th inst., and your editorial of the same date on the line and staff dispute. I am tempted by that communication, and the interest that your paper shows in the question, to ask for space to give you some opinions formed on the subject of line and staff rank in the navy during four or five years' service as a staff officer. While the letter referred to is temperate, there runs through it a vein of self-complacency that always comes to the surface whenever this subject is discussed by the line. The pride that produces this feeling flows from a lack of appreciation of the present and future relations of the branches of our naval service. The writer does not think that the line understands the true position of the staff, composed principally of Engineers and Surgeons, and he also believes that the majority of these two corps do not see the full scope of the positions they fill.

The navy as now officered contains, including the active and retired lists, a little over 1,800 officers. Of these one-third belongs to the staff, consisting of Engineers, Surgeons, Naval Constructors, Paymasters and Professors in the Naval Academy. Are the duties of these persons important enough to constitute them an essential part of the navy? I think they are. The first three mentioned are certainly coordinate with the highest branches of the service. First, we have the Engineer; without a doubt he is, in modern days, the most important officer on board ship. He controls the motive power in time of action, understands the construction of the hull of the vessel, and should be thoroughly conversant with the management of all the mechanical appliances necessary to insure success in battle, not excepting a perfect knowledge of artillery. He should add to this enough seamanship to make him at home on deck as well as in the engine room. The Surgeon has charge of the health and comfort of the entire crew. Their morale often depends upon his care and skill. As a skilled observer of the scientific phenomena of many seas and climes, his importance to the country cannot be overestimated. The Naval Constructor builds our ships—that is sufficient. He should rank among the highest. To the integrity and capacity of the Paymaster is committed the happiness of many wives and children who wait longingly for the return of their dear ones, drawing meanwhile part of the monthly pay, and who, if Jack is kindly treated, will receive his savings from him at the end of the cruise. The Chaplains have a high trust confided to them—the moral and religious instruction of the crews at sea and ashore. The Professors are men of learning, to whom is entrusted the education the youth who are to officer our ships. Are they not also entitled to some consideration? During the rebellion the staff shared with the line all the dangers of battle and the privations of the blockade. On board ship every one is exposed to the trials of the sea, and the knowledge that all must in time acquire of that treacherous element ought to beget a feeling of mutual self-respect between the two branches, which would accord to each individual the rank that his commission from the President gives him. This, I fear, the line is not willing to give. I have said that I think the line and staff do not fully comprehend their relation to each other. The line of to-day—that is the purely military branch of the service—is not, to use an old naval simile, the strong oak around which the staff twines as a tender parasite, more ornamental than useful. We have steam now. Fewer but more intelligent hands do the work than formerly. We have great guns worked by machinery. Every accomplished naval officer must be a good engineer. The days when midshipmen began their careers by learning the mysteries of knot and splice from the boatswain's mate, on a long cruise, are gone by. Their school is the engine room now. The Engineers, who compose the great body of the staff, are the future Captains and Admirals of our navy; not the individuals high in this corps today, but those that follow them, and who will not tread exactly in their footsteps.

The squabble about shoulder straps and mere precedence, is only one of the symptoms of the change that is taking place. We want a fair field of promotion for all. Every engineer, midshipman and landsman who gets a warrant in the navy, should see a path open to him in which he may win an Admiral's commission, if he proves himself competent and has the ability. How shall we establish this fair field of promotions? The writer advocates the passage of a law requiring that all naval appointees shall graduate from the Naval Academy, excepting, of course, the Surgeons, who require a special education, and who should constitute the only auxiliary corps in the service. The compact organization of the navy requires some such change as this. Once break down the barriers that difference in knowledge now makes between the various corps, and we would have none of these petty bickerings about rank. The engineer, deck officer and surgeon would respect each other for their common knowledge, and a common origin in the Naval Academy would be a bond of union among them, while all being satisfied would be willing to accord to the doctor, as a man of science, that peace and immunity from control, which is necessary to the practice of his profession. One who has not lived on board ship cannot imagine the ignorance that prevails amongst officers concerning the simplest details of their messmates' duties. I have seen many engineers who could not box the compass, much less take an observation of the sun, while on the other hand, there are line officers who know quite as little about the engine as if ships were still propelled by sails alone. Of the marine officer it may be said that he learns nothing of either branch of the profession, his study and daily practice being confined to the simplest manual at arms, with a handful of men, for half an hour each day. In conclusion, I would say that our navy requires a change of organization as follows: All officers, excepting Surgeons, should win their commissions by passing through the Naval Academy, acquiring there a thorough seaman's education, which should include, as its most important branch, a knowledge of the engine and steam machinery, such as is now possessed by our engineers. When graduated they should be divided between the deck and engine room divisions, as is now done at West Point in officering the different corps of the army. Engineers and deck officers should rise alike to the highest rank and command in the service. Paymasters could be chosen from the grades of Commander and Lieutenant in either of the two divisions above named. For the Surgeons no better plan could be devised than the competitive examinations by which they now enter. X.

THE STATE CANALS.

Proposed Government Aid for the Enlargement of the Erie and Oswego Canals.

In the House of Representatives, on the 16th inst., Mr. BENNETT, of this State, introduced the following bill, and it was read twice, referred to the Committee of Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

A BILL to provide for the better protection of the Northern and Northwestern frontier, and to facilitate commerce, and diminish the expense of the exchanges between States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue to the Comptroller of the State of New-York, on the credit of the United States, coupon or registered bonds, of such denominations, not less than $100 each, as he may think proper, to an amount not exceeding $15,000,000, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the Government at any time after ten years, and payable in coin at the end of fifty years from date, and bearing interest at the rate of four and a half per centum per annum, payable semi-annually in coin; provided, that before the said bonds shall have been delivered to the Comptroller of the State of New-York, the Legislature of the said State, by enactment or by joint resolution, shall have given a pledge for the State that all that portion of its debt for the paying of which the revenues of its canals are constitutionally appropriated, shall be immediately discharged; that thereafter no tolls nor tax of any description shall be levied or collected by the State upon any property transported through or upon any of the canals, except a uniform charge not exceeding one-half mill per thousand pounds per mile, to be collected for the purpose of defraying the annual cost of the maintenance of the said canals; and that any excess of appropriation or tonnage dues shall be applied to the enlargement of the Erie and Oswego Canals, and that the Erie and Oswego Canals shall, at as early a day as possible, be fitted for navigation by boats of not less than 250 tons burden, by an enlargement of their locks, and by such deepening and widening of their prism as may be necessary to their navigation by such boats.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of said bonds as shall be in excess of an amount equal to the canal debt of the State of New-York, which is to be discharged in the manner provided above, shall be [illegible] Secretary of the Treasury [illegible] Comptroller of the State of New-York an amount of said bonds equivalent to the cost of the work which shall have been properly and satisfactorily done within the three months then last past.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint, with the consent of the Senate, three Commissioners of the United States, whose duty it shall be to supervise and inspect the work done upon the Erie and Oswego Canals, in compliance with the stipulations of this act, and upon whose report, once in every three months, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver the bonds as above provided, to the Comptroller of the State of New-York; the said Commissioners to receive for their compensation not more than at the rate of $5,000 per annum during actual service, with 10 cents per mile for the expenses of actual travel in the performance of their duties.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect immediately.

The Issue Between Dr. Ewer and the Bishop of Connecticut—A Correction.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

The item which you copied from the Hartford Times in your yesterday's issue, relative to Dr. EWER and the Bishop of Connecticut, contained two errors, which in justice to both those divines, should be corrected. The following card which appeared in the Hartford Times, of Thursday last, contradicts that Dr. EWER has been inhibited the Diocese of Connecticut; nor have the points at issue any reference to the doctrine of the Holy Eucharist;

THE SERMON OF DR. EWER—A CORRECTION.

The following correspondence will in the main explain itself. It may be necessary to suggest, however, that Bishop WILLIAMS does not by the terms of his answer here given, make himself responsible for Dr. EWER'S views on the subject of the Holy Eucharist, whether in his East Hartford sermon or elsewhere enunciated. He simply denies that the teaching on that subject has formed the subjects of his correspondence with Dr. EWER, or will form the basis of his forthcoming action, whatever that may be.

HARTFORD, Feb. 17, A. D. 1870.

Right Rev. John Williams, D. D., Middletown, Conn.:

Do the papers correctly report that you have prohibited Dr. EWER from preaching again in this diocese until he has explained views concerning the Eucharist enunciated in a sermon lately preached in St. John's, East Hartford? Please telegraph your answer.

JNO. J. MCCOOK.

[Copy of Answer.]

Have not prohibited Dr. EWER. Have written,—not about the Eucharist. Action will depend on his reply. J. WILLIAMS.

In the interest of the truth in this matter, I offer this latter statement.

A FRIEND OF BOTH.

New Catholic Church at Williamsbridge —Laying the Corner Stone.

The ceremony of laying the corner stone of a new Catholic church at Williamsbridge took place about 1 o'clock yesterday, according to announcement. Special trains were run on the Harlem Railroad for the convenience of those wishing to attend, and the cars inside, platforms and roofs were crowded to the utmost capacity. The Tuckahoe Father Mathew T. A. B. Society, Father Mathew T. A. B. Society No. 2 of Mt. Vernon, Father Mathew T. A. Society No. 1 of Westchester Village with band, Father Mathew T. A. B. Society of Morrisania, Benevolent Society of Our Lady of Mercy of Fordham, St. Augustine Mutual Benedt Society of Morrisania were all fully represented on the occasion. They formed in line of march at the railroad depot and proceeded to the site of the new edifice, where about two hundred boys from the Protectory, with their youthful band of musicians, attended. The assemblage was variously estimated at from four to ten thousand persons.

Very Rev. Wm. STARRS, V. G., officiated, assisted by Rev. W. CLOWRY, pastor of St. Gabriel's Church, New-York; Rev. JAMES L. CONRON, of Staten Island; Rev. Father MCQUADE, of St. John's College, Fordham; Rev. J. H. COLE, of St. Raymond's Church, Westchester; Rev. THOMAS MCLOUGHLIN, of New-Rochelle; Rev. JOHN MCEVOY, of White Plains; Rev. JOHN HUGHES, of Mott Haven; Rev. JOHN GREES, of Manhattanville; and Rev. Father KINSELLA, of Westchester.

A tin box, rendered airtight, and containing all the coins of the country, copies of the daily journals published in New-York, also copies of the TIMES, Tribune and Herald published in 1869, together with sundry documents in relation to parchment relative to the history of the church up to the present time, was deposited in a cavity prepared to receive it in the corner stone, and covered by another stone of similar dimensions. The corner stone and the basement walls of the edifice were sprinkled with holy water and blessed by the Vicar-General in the usual manner. His Grace then delivered a short sermon, taking for his text the first verse of the 126th Psalm: "Unless the Lord bless the house they labor in vain that build it." In the course of his remarks he took occasion to allude to the energy, zeal and success of Rev. Father KINSELLA, who had built up three prosperous churches in the neighborhood, besides the foundation of the one in course—those at Westchester, Mount Vernon, Tuckahoe and Williamsbridge being all in his parish, and established within the last ten years. The new church is dedicated to St. William the Abbot. The basement walls are of stone, but the upper part will be a frame building, sixty-four feet long by forty-four feet wide, with an extension in the rear of twenty feet for the altar.

Arrest of a Noted Thief—A Bevy of Lesser Criminals.

During Saturday night the store of PETRY & O'HARE, No. 399 Third-avenue, was entered by burglars, by a second-story window, which they reached from a rear shed. After ransacking the place, they only found twenty-five pounds of solder and $2 in money which they could make available. Subsequently, Detectives MULLIN and ULL, of the Twenty-first Precinct, found the solder in a junk shop, in Twenty-fourth-street, near First-avenue, where it had been sold by a boy, PATRICK MCCABE, who, being arrested, confessed that he had committed the burglary in company with another boy, whom he refused to name, and who has not yet been found. MCCABE was committed by Justice COULTER for trial at the General Sessions.

A quarrel occurred yesterday morning in the oyster saloon No. 261 Bowery, kept by JEFFERSON DAVIS, during which JOHN FOLEY, of No. 109 Mulberry-street, received two stab wounds, one in each thigh. The wounds were dressed by Dr. PHILLIPS, of Bellevue Hospital, after which the injured man was sent home. The assailant was not arrested, and is not known by the Police.

ISADORE O. F. CHROUSE, a colored woman, was committed yesterday, by Alderman COMAN, at the Tombs Police Court, upon a charge of robbing GUSTAV SCHMIDT, of No. 137 Grand street, of $9 in money and a diamond ring valued at $60. It was stated that the robbery had been committed while he was in her company in a house in Crosby-street.

Saturday evening WILLIAM BROWN broke into the cigar manufactory of MENGIN & BORCH, on the fourth floor of No. 381 Pearl-street, and having packed up a large quantity of cigars, was about to depart with them when he was discovered and arrested by the Police. Being arraigned yesterday at the Tombs Police Court, he was committed on a charge of burglary.

A horse and wagon, valued at $800, having been stolen from JOHN G. BURKE, of No. 78 Centre-street, were yesterday found in possession of JOHN FOLEY, who was thereupon arrested by Officer RUSH, of the Fourteenth Precinct, and was yesterday committed by Alderman COMAN for trial.

The Murder of John Murkle—Arrest of the Alleged Assassin.

At the Jefferson Market Police Court yesterday, before Judge COX, PETER MAGINNIS, aged 23, who resides at No. 124 Tenth-avenue, was arraigned on a charge of complicity in the murder of JOHN MURKLE, who was stabbed to death in front of his house, No. 459 Tenth-avenue, on the night of the 1st of January. The particulars of the case have been already fully recorded in the TIMES. The prisoner was arrested on Saturday evening by Officer ERICK, of the Sixteenth Precinct, and was yesterday remanded to enable the officer to make further inquiries into the circumstances of the case. The inquest will take place at noon to-day by Coroner KELLY.

12. See the Conquering Hero Comes.
13. Viva L'America.
14. Yankee Doodle.

Smuggling Through the Post Office.

Postmaster JONES sent, on Saturday, several packages of books and bundles to the Custom House that duties might be collected on them. It appears that the law allows samples of articles to be received from foreign countries by mail free of duty. The privilege has frequently been abused by the transmission of very large samples of considerable value, and the Postmaster and Collector, after a conference on the subject, determined to treat such matter as dutiable.

IMPRISONED FOR LIFE.

Severe Punishment for Contempt of Court.

The Case of William Mullee—His Confinement in Ludlow-street Jail for the Last Twenty Months—A Chapter in the History of the Great India Rubber Suits.

On the 3d of June, 1868, a man named WILLIAM MULLEE, was committed to Ludlow-street Jail for having, it was alleged, shown contempt towards the United States District Court for this district. Ever since that time the sombre prison doors through which he then entered have been perpetually closed on him, and the long interval of twenty months which has elapsed has been passed by him in a cheerless, miserable little cell in the top tier of the jail. The payment of a fine of $2,500 was made the condition of his release when sentence was imposed on him; but this amount, according to his friends' representations, was so far beyond his means that there was no possibility of his ever being able to raise it. His sentence was virtually, therefore, imprisonment for life.

THE CAUSE OF HIS COMMITMENT.

The charge of contempt which was made against MULLEE grew out of one of the Goodyear India Rubber Patent suits, the history of which is almost as incomprehensible as the Schleswig-Holstein question. The particular suit in which MULLEE appears has two distinct and contradictory sides to it, one of which is represented by MULLEE and the other by two wealthy Germans, Messrs. POPPENHUSEN and KORNIG. These two last named gentlemen are reported to be the possessors of fabulous fortunes, having made them through the Goodyear patent, of which they are at present the principal, if not the sole owners. They own extensive manufactories and residences at College Point, on Long Island Sound. There they live in baronial splendor. It is said, in proof of their great riches, that they regularly derive $60,000 a week by the manufacture of hard rubber, and that they paid tax during one year on $40,000,000, as the amount of the receipts in their gigantic monopoly. A considerable portion of their income is obtained in the shape of "royalties" which are paid to them by various manufacturers for the right to employ hard rubber in the making of certain goods. According to the Goodyear invention the vulcanization of rubber was made by the admixture of from four to sixteen ounces of sulphur with one pound of rubber, and these proportions constituted the hard rubber made under what is known as the Goodyear patent. Now, MULLEE is represented to have been for years a persistent, flagrant and inveterate infringer on the rights given under the above patent, and to have repeatedly violated and disregarded injunctions procured against him for infringement.

ONE SIDE OF THE CASE.

The following is one of the statements which have been made in the case:

It was claimed that he had infringed upon some one of the numerous patents which have been issued for the manufacture of india rubber, and a suit was commenced against him to put a stop to the infringement. The Circuit Court of the United States in this district issued an injunction forbidding further infringement.

Brought up before the Court on a charge of violating this injunction, he was found guilty, but was discharged with an admonition to respect it in future. He carried on his manufacture in spite of the admonition, however, taking some pains to conceal his offence here, while in Pennsylvania, where he had a manufactory, and where proceedings were also taken against him, he undertook resistance to the officers of the law. Subsequently he was sentenced to pay a fine of $2,500, and was then remanded to jail, there to stay until such fine was paid. After lying in jail some time he presented a petition to the Court which had committed him, praying that he might be discharged, because he could not pay. The Court made answer that under the law it had no jurisdiction to grant his request, but that as in the case of other prisoners he must apply to the Executive for a pardon. Application was accordingly made for a pardon to President JOHNSON who was then in office. The matter was referred to Attorney-General EVARTS, who reported against issuing the pardon. Mr. JOHNSON followed the opinion of the Attorney-General, and refused to issue the pardon.

In October last, MULLEE, having been in prison a year and four months, applied again to the Court. Judge BLATCHFORD rendered a decision on that application, which was not then published, but which our readers will find in our legal columns to-day. The Judge went again over the legal ground on which it was held that the President had the power to pardon for such offences as for other offences against the laws of the United States, but closed his decision by saying that if this pardoning power in their case was disclaimed by the Executive, the case might be again brought before the Court. Application has been made to the present Administration for a pardon, but as yet no action has been taken in the matter, either in the way of granting the application, or disclaiming the power to grant pardons for such offences.

MULLEE'S OWN STORY.

MULLEE states that he obtained a patent for the manufacture of rubber on the 31st of March, 1868, after hard fighting, and that he subsequently commenced to manufacture. He claims that he strictly adhered to rights given to him by the patent, and that he made hard rubber with a greater proportion of sulphur than one of the [illegible] of the Court, [illegible] Executive authority, to [illegible] that case. In his opinion, given to the Secretary of State in February last, the Attorney-General says: "The Supreme Court of the United States has decided we should do, the principles established by the common law respecting the operation of a pardon, where a person is under many sentences such as I have been held to extend to a contempt committed in Westminster Hall, under circumstances not materially different from those which occurred in the case submitted to the President. I am, therefore, of opinion that, should the President consider the facts stated to justify the exercise of his constitutional power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States, there is nothing in the character of this offence which withdraws it from the general authority." I must, therefore, again refer the applicant to the President. If the President shall disclaim all right and power as a part of his constitutional prerogative, to grant relief in this case, the matter may be again brought before me.

YORKVILLE POLICE COURT.

Before Justice Coulter.

A HATCH OF YOUNG BURGLARS.

Patrick Gardner, Patrick Culkin, Lawrence Moorhead, Peter Wood and David Bland, each about 17 years of age, were yesterday brought before Justice COULTER, charged with having burglariously entered the butcher's shop of Frederick Buckie, at No. 494 Second-avenue, and stolen some money and small articles of value to the value of $5. The Judge was reluctantly compelled to discharge Gardner, Culkin and Wood, as Buckie declined to make any charge, but the other two aspirants for Sing Sing, having confessed their participation in the burglary and having had some of the stolen property in their possession when arrested, were held for trial in $500 bail. They are evidently hardened young ruffians, and seemed quite unaffected by their position.

TWO MORE JUVENILE THIEVES.

Richard Benton and Benjamin Benton, a pair of young scamps, who have for a long time enjoyed the unenviable reputation of being disobedient sons and reckless scapegraces, were yesterday brought up on a charge of stealing, in conjunction with Oscar Moore—a newly married prisoner man, who is still at large—quantity of fancy goods, the property of Samuel Harris, of No. 553 Eighth-avenue. The Bentons lived in the same house in which Harris' store is, and effected an entrance by breaking through a partition. Moore had confessed the theft to a young German, named Henry Meyerdeaks, and Detectives Thomas Maher and Michael Terry, having been detailed to work up the case, succeeded in discovering part of the property and arresting the juvenile delinquents. They were held for examination by Justice COULTER.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

EUROPE.

A Paris dispatch says that an Imperial decree convokes the High Court of Justice to meet at Tours March 21, for the trial of Prince PIERRE BONAPARTE. The members of the Court will be determined by lot. The defence, according to the Gazette des Tribunaux, will be that provocation was given and the killing was in self-defence. The decision of the High Court of France was published on Saturday, and is more serious than was at first supposed. He is adjudged to have committed homicide on the person of VICTOR NOIR, and to have attempted the homicide of FONVILLE. The order of the Court places the Prince under article 304 of the Penal Code, the punishment of which is death, unless extenuating circumstances are shown, in which case the sentence can be lessened by two degrees....The name of ROCHEFORT is no longer to appear in the Marseillaise as its editor, but that of M. DANGERVILLE is to be substituted. This is regarded as a cover for ROCHEFORT, who will in reality conduct the paper.....The appointment of M. PARADOL as French Minister to Washington, is said to be delayed by the remonstrances of "unemployed diplomats."....The Carlist Committees in Spain are said to be vigorously at work and extending their operations to the frontier of the country. The Madrid Imparcial says that several chiefs have recently left France and have entered the north of Spain. The Duke of MONTPENSIER has written a letter which has been published in which he says that "Spain is his country by tradition, adoption and affection."....An exciting discussion has occupied the attention of the Prussian Parliament for the last few days in relation to the policy of Count BISMARCK, which was bitterly attacked by many members....A Berlin dispatch states that the old officers of the North Parliament have been reelected.... The Carnival at Rome has opened, but the streets do not present the usual appearance of gayety....The Spectator of Saturday contains an article in reference to Canadian independence, in which it is stated that England might let Canada be free, but that "she is as loath to part with her Empire as was the United States to part with the Southern Confederacy."....The London Observer expresses confidence in the passage of the Irish Land bill.

CONGRESS.

In the Senate on Saturday resolutions of the Virginia Legislature, asking for a general removal of political disabilities in the State, were received and tabled. Bills were introduced relative to unexpended appropriations and for the disposal of useless military reservations. The resolution for the return of certain private papers to the family of ex-President JEFFERSON was reported from Committee and passed. The annual Post Route bill, and the House bill providing for an appropriation of $3,000 to defray the expenses of investigating the alleged sale of cadetships, were both passed. Mr. SPENCER, by consent, addressed the Senate upon the bill to regulate the hours of labor for Government employes, principally in reply to the recent speech of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The bill granting lands to aid in constructing a certain railway in Oregon was then taken up, and a discussion ensued upon the policy of granting public lands to build railways in the West. A resolution to strike out the land grants was defeated by a vote of 3 to 37, and the bill was then variously amended and passed. The Senate at 4 P. M. adjourned.

In the House, after some discussion as to the order of business, the consideration of the Appropriation bill was resumed in Committee of the Whole. An amendment providing for an appropriation of $21,000 to construct a branch mint at Carson City, Nev., was adopted, Mr. DAWES remarking that he should call the yeas and nays on it in the House. Pending action on an amendment appropriating $15,000 to the Board of Education the Committee rose. A bill was introduced to provide stay of execution in certain cases. It is intended as a measure of relief against the recent legal-tender decisions. A large number of petitions were presented. Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Rules, reported a new rule in regard to contested election cases, which provides that the Committee on Elections for this Congress shall consist of fifteen members, and that each contested election case shall be assigned to a special Committee of three of the General Committee, who shall consider it exclusively, and report their decision direct to the House. The rule was adopted. The House then again went into Committee of the Whole for general debate, and at 3:45 P. M. adjourned.

GENERAL.

Our news from San Domingo is that President BAEZ has received a communication from influential parties in Venezuela, asking his influence with the Government of this country in favor of the annexation of Venezuela to the United States.

At Baltimore, Md., on Friday, a colored boy named WM. COOK, aged 11 years, while playing with two other boys in a barn, placed a halter around his neck in sport, and stepping or falling from a bale of hay, hanged himself. Before he was rescued life was extinct.

Two cases of relapsing fever were reported in Washington last week, both in crowded tenements.

A man named FRANK MONNTZ was fatally stabbed by an associate named RICHARD MCCRACKEN, at Wheeling, West Va., on Friday. The murderer was arrested and placed in the lock-up, but escaped during the night, and has not yet been recaptured.

An addition to the correspondence on the attack on Americans in Havana, was submitted to Congress on Saturday. It contains the statement of the Consul General of France, who witnessed the affair, and facts connected with the nationality and citizenship of GREENWALDTH.

One JOHN C. CRONIN, while disputing with a stranger in the street in Philadelphia, on Friday night, on the subject of Fenianism, was shot and dangerously wounded.

The Monarch arrived at Annapolis on Friday evening, and anchored six miles out. On Saturday Captain COMMERELL, Governor CHAMBERLAIN, of Maine, and Captains WOOD and MCFANE, came ashore, and were received by Secretary ROBESON and Commodore WORDEN, Superintendent of the Naval Academy. The party, excepting the Secretary of the Navy, afterwards called on Governor BOWIE, where they were entertained.

WM. H. HARRISON and GEORGE HARRISON, of Green Island, WM. ALLEN, of North Adams, and CHARLES B. CONKLING, of Albany, have all been indicted by the Grand Jury in Albany for robbing the American Express Company. CONKLING had charge of the express car and safe, and, as claimed, was gagged by the other three and robbed of $65,000 on the Central Railroad in August, 1869, between Fonda and Albany. CONKLING's complicity was shown and he was indicted jointly with the others, and plead not guilty. Bail in the case of CONKLING was fixed at $20,000.

CALVIN C. CLARK, of Bell County, Texas, while moving with his family to Little Rock, Ark., was shot and killed by a noted desperado named SAM HALSEY. CLARK had been active in assisting the Sheriff of Bell County in breaking up a gang to which HALSEY belonged, and was followed when he left the county. Large rewards have been offered for the arrest of the murderer.

A clerk in the Baltimore (Md.) Post Office named ROBERT DALE was arrested in that city Saturday, charged with robbing the mails. He was held to bail in the sum of $5,000.

The dispatches from Maine relate chiefly to the effects of the heavy rain of Friday night. The Androscoggin and Kennebec are greatly swollen, and ice jams at many points have been productive of much damage.

A large dairy, barn and stables near Cincinnati were destroyed by fire yesterday morning, and a large number of cows and several mules, horses and calves were burned to death.

JOHN DONLON (61 years old) and PATRICK BERHAN, convicted at Rochester of murder in the second degree for different offences, were sentenced to State's Prison for life. The wife of the former, who was implicated with her husband in his crime, was also found guilty and sentenced for fifteen years. EDWARD DORSEY, convicted of manslaughter, was at the same time sentenced to four years' imprisonment.

The schooner Piper left San Francisco on Saturday with blasting materials on board, to be used in removing the coral reef at the entrance of Midway Island Harbor, so as to make the island a coaling station for the China and Government steamers.

The bricklayers, plasterers and stone masons of Albany have resolved to strike, the master builders having given notice of a reduction of wages, to go into effect on the 1st of March.

Congress and the Administration.

The statements of our Washington correspondent in regard to the feeling prevalent in Congress towards the Administration, may excite surprise. There have not been wanting indications of captiousness, not to say hostility, on the part of Senators in the matter of appointments. But the country has scarcely dreamed of anything like alienation between the majority in Congress and the President, and has certainly not ascribed to any considerable number of members a disposition to separate from the Administration and seek a new point of political departure Our correspondent's statements, however, are sufficiently specific to challenge attention. Nor is the danger he describes lessened by the nature of the causes in which it appears to originate. The President earnestly labors for retrenchment and reduced taxation. Senators and Representatives, on the other hand, while professedly favorable to both, virtually obstruct both by their clamor for offices. In an issue of this nature, and in any difficulties that may grow out of it, we know where the sympathies of the people will be found. They want relief, and if they fail to get it they will hold Congress responsible.

Reconstruction Nationalized.

Hitherto the Republican policy of Reconstruction has been essentially sectional. It has been the means employed by the major power in the Union to extinguish the last signs of the rebellion, and to reëstablish order and authority in the Southern States, in accordance with the principles and purposes which triumphed in the war. The measures employed for the attainment of this object were necessarily exceptional in their nature, and resulted in a reorganization of States on a basis fundamentally different from that which previously existed. The change, though arbitrary, was not unjust,—though radical, it was not illogical. The fact of resistance to the National Government was a sufficient reason for exacting guarantees against the recurrence of conflict. The fact of emancipation introduced a new element into citizenship, imposed upon a race new obligations, and entitled them to new privileges, and rendered inevitable the measures necessary to protect them in the exercise of the power conferred upon them. The proceedings incident to this policy may sometimes have looked harsh and objectionable. But the harshness, wherever it appeared, was simply the exercise of an absolute authority in a case which had resisted milder methods of treatment. And the features most objected to have really been the natural developments of a revolution hasn in hostility to the Union, and making practically, in the revision of some of its conditions, and the consolidation of the power.

The Fourteenth Amendment invested the colored man with citizenship, and the Reconstruction acts gave him his share of political power. The citizenship was national,—the suffrage was restricted to the States to which those laws applied. Thus the anomaly was presented of a race enfranchised in certain States by virtue of Federal authority, and disfranchised in others by reason of local law. A prejudice begotten of slavery, after having been set at naught in States which once were devoted to its maintenance, was perpetuated in the States which had decreed emancipation, and invested the Southern negro with almost controlling power. The Fifteenth Amendment therefore became necessary, not only to harmonize the conditions of suffrage throughout the Union with the conditions imposed upon the South, but to guarantee those at the South who had coöperated with the National Government against possible political vicissitudes in their own States. The Amendment does this without impairing the control of States over the question of suffrage. It neither enacts universal suffrage, nor forbids the application of tests, whether of education or property, as qualifications for voters. It simply forbids unjust discrimination in the enforcement of tests. In providing that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude,"—it secures political equality. The measure was the completion of the work of which emancipation was the commencement. It purges the Union of the last taint of slavery, and makes Reconstruction national.

The Mormon Question.

We can never legislate virtue against vice, and any attempt to achieve purely moral results by enactments of Congress will certainly fail. The moral law carries with it its own penalty. We cannot make men good by declaring that all men must be good. That declaration was made on Sinai, and mere men cannot amend or strengthen it. We are taught to do good—by moral example—by education—by a knowledge of the blessing and comfort and honor that come from a careful distinction between what is good and what is evil. Law fulfills its mission when it protects society from the effects of evil men and evil deeds. Religion and education must do the rest!

This is the main reason for our dislike to General CULLOM's Mormon bill. That measure proposes to do by force what can only be done by reason. The Mormon question has not yet presented itself, as an aggressive political fact. We have never allowed the Mormon people any voice in our Government, or any existence but that of territorial abeyance. Now and then we have had Mormon scandals, but they vanished before a resolute Federal presence. The "war" that was menaced in BUCHANAN'S time was as much a contractor's war as anything else, and practically ended with the transportation of supplies. The Mormons are practically aliens. They gain nearly all of their proselytes in foreign countries. We rarely hear of a Mormon colony in the East. Here and there in the slums sometimes we hear of Mormon missionaries and conversions to the gospel of SMITH, but as a faith it has made no impression upon civilization. This result has been attained without law. Reason and religion have done it all. The Mormon felt that he was a moral outlaw, and he sought immunity and growth in a territory of his own. There he has lived, mainly thrifty, industrious, full of enterprise and vigor, under the sway of a rude CROMWELL, adding wealth to the Republic. In a material way, Mormonism has been a gain to the country. It taught us what could be done in the far deserts. It was the pioneer of immigration and settlement beyond the Rocky Mountains. The Mormon has been useful as a tiller of the soil—a builder of cities and railways, and in reclaiming from the wilderness a garden of surpassing fertility and beauty.

If there has been any moral example to us in the Mormon faith, it has been good. Our people who live decently and lawfully, and eschew heathenism and vain things, have had no better incentive than the Mormon practice. Nearer home we find Communists who believe in interchanging wives, and Shakers, who practice celibacy, and disciples of promiscuous marriage and "affinities." Bad as Mormonism is, the Oneida Community is far worse—nay, it has the element of blasphemy; for while the Mormon sins in the name of a mock apostle and a grotesque faith, the Communist pretends to live in the Gospel of Jesus Christ as taught by him and his followers. And yet we allow Oneida to remain unchallenged and under the protection of our laws. Its leaders do business in New-York City, and we hear of no law penalty and no proposed army of extirpation. We have social customs in New-York City as bad as Mormonism and Communism, which are not even under the surveillance of the Police. We tolerate them, and find consolation by calling them "necessary evils." We see sin at our own door, and should meet it here, if we propose to make any reform. Why go to Utah with an army to conquer a social and religious evil which has a darker counterpart in New-York?

So long as Mormonism is a religious and moral fault, we must combat it with religious and moral influences. Christ's Gospel cannot be preached by artillery and riflemen. The moment we war upon a religion we make it a power, give it new life, stimulate its friends, arouse dormant compliance into enthusiastic devotion and sympathy, attract followers and converts, and in the end, fail in the effort of aggression. The blood of martyrs is the seed of the Church, and the moment we use fire and faggot to tear down, we build up. Already, in the Mormon country, there are abundant evidences of disintegration. BRIGHAM YOUNG, who has ruled his church and territory with a vigor and genius that remind us of CROMWELL—and men whose brain and will the whole

Utah to a standard of peacefulness and disenchanting light. Time and progress and good example, and the influence of Christ's Gospel, will conquer Mormonism. The law must let it alone—unless it becomes an element of disorder.

Legal Tender Justified by the Emergency—The British Precedent.

In our recent article on the legal-tender question, as affected by the decision of the Supreme Court, we stated that during the war with NAPOLEON Great Britain resorted to the policy of "making the bills of the Bank of England in effect a legal tender." The accuracy of this view of British legislation has been questioned in some instances without regarding the qualifying words which we now distinguish with italics. The question involves an interesting point in English history, and one that bears directly upon the legality of the Legal-tender act in its application to preëxisting debts, which, as Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. CHASE invoked, and which, as Chief Justice, he lately helped to annul.

In May, 1797, the British Parliament passed an act restricting the Bank of England from making ordinary payments in coin for its circulating notes, and declaring that all persons who offered them in payment should not be liable to arrest. A person sued and not arrested might be required by any Judge of the Court to cause notes of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England on their face payable on demand—to be the sum of money for which the defendant might have been held to bail, if the act had not been passed "to be deposited in such manner as the Court or such Judge shall direct, to answer the demands of the plaintiff or plaintiffs in such action."

The provisions of this act applied in suits at law, but not to proceedings for distraint, and Lord KING having demanded from his tenants payment of their rent in gold coin or its equivalent, Lord STANHOPE supported a bill, which was passed, not only to prevent proceedings for distress in case of such tender, but enacting that taking gold coin at more than its nominal value, or bank notes at less, should be deemed a misdemeanor. The language of the second section of the bill—which may be found in volume 51 of the Statutes at Large, page 433—is very specific. It provides "that no person shall by any means, device, shift or contrivance whatsoever receive or pay any note or notes, bill or bills of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, for less than the amount of lawful money expressed therein and to be thereby made payable, except only lawful discount on such note or bill as shall not be expressed to be payable on demand; and every person who shall offend herein shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor." The third section provides that in case of proceedings by distress to recover rent from any tenant "it shall be lawful for such tenant or other person to tender notes of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England expressed to be payable on demand," and if the tender is accepted, or if refused, the goods taken on such distress or pounding shall be forthwith returned to the party distrained upon, unless a greater sum shall be claimed. If no more was found due, the party tendering was entitled to the costs of all subsequent proceedings. All other remedies were allowed.

It was in support of this act that Lord Chancellor ELDON, who was spoken of as having done three-fourths of the governing of the Kingdom, said: "I am peculiarly situated with respect to this question, having the official care of twenty-five millions of the property of His Majesty's subjects, and without the means of enforcing the payment of any part of that sum except in bank notes." This declaration doubtless arose from the fact that gold coin had not, since the act of May, 1797, been collected under execution from debtors, but only Bank of England notes. Their compulsory circulation and use as the medium of domestic commerce, in the collection of the revenue, and in the collection of debts, was thoroughly accomplished. Those bills, by the series of acts passed,—the principal of which we have referred to,—became "in effect, a legal tender," so far as concerned all ordinary proceedings instituted against debtors.

The circumstances under which England was compelled to resort to this compulsory circulation were somewhat similar but not nearly so controlling as were those which induced our Government to imitate the spirit of the example. Great Britain had in circulation at the time no notes under £5, and consequently gold and silver were largely retained by individuals to make payments under that sum. We, on the contrary, in February, 1862, were afflicted with the circulation in all of the States of bills of the denomination of $5, and in many of them of bills of as low a denomination as $1, which circulation, by force of an invariable law, expelled from use the sums in gold and silver, which otherwise would have been retained in what, in specie-paying countries, is always the most important depository of them,—the pockets of the people.

On Sunday, the 25th of February, 1797, the Privy Council of England met, to make provision against the unusual drain of specie which the bank on the day before had suffered "in consequence," the Council stated, "of ill-founded or exaggerated alarms in different parts of the country;" and they unanimously decided—the King being present on an occasion which is spoken of as his only open violation of the Sabbath—to restrict the bank from making any payments in coin until the sense of Parliament could be taken. On the 3d of May following, Parliament confirmed the step and passed the bill to which we have referred.

Now in December, 1861, the associated banks convened in this City, and through their representative, Mr. GALLATIN, informed the Secretary of the Treasury that they could aid the Government no longer, and that it was a question of a few days more time which should break first,—the banks or the Government. On the 31st of that month they suspend specie payment, and as they differed from the Bank of England, which was, in the language of Mr. PITT, "a great engine of State," and were only local institutions bound by no fealty to the General Government and having no element of harmony, it was essential to the general safety to cut loose from them and rely wholly on the power of the National Government.

From the first establishment of the Union, Congress had declared what should constitute a tender for debts, and from time to time had changed the regulations on this subject so as to make it clear that it was the recognised sole depository of this power to provide a tender and alter the standard. If it was competent for Congress to diminish the quantity of pure silver or gold contained in its coins one per cent., it was competent for it to do so to a greater extent. Whoever contracted to pay in dollars anterior to the change had a right to pay afterwards in the new coins at their nominal value, and be discharged of his debt, precisely as if the contract had specified that it had been made in contemplation of such change, and that it was to be fulfilled in the new coinage. This power appertains to the Congress of the United States as part of its legislative authority. The States were expressly restricted from impairing the obligation of contracts, but the General Government was left unrestricted, because, among other things, it would have prevented a change in the standard.

In an unparalleled emergency, when the life and property of individuals and the integrity of the nation were at stake, the General Government, having exhausted its power to borrow and not having time to set in motion its power to tax, and being driven to the issue of a national currency, applied its power to impart a legal tender to this description of money. The measure was, in the circumstances, a necessary means to the prosecution of the war; and the right to use the means follows as a necessary exercise of the war power.

Senator Morton's Ironclad Resolution.

Senator MORTON has just introduced into Congress an exceedingly important resolution, calling upon the President for information as to the number and character of our ironclads, their cost, the list of their designers and the present condition of the vessels. This resolution has been agreed to, and we may therefore conclude that many of the vexed questions of ironclad construction will be set at rest by official authority.

It is understood that there are letters now at the Department emphatically protesting against building the light-draught monitors on the plans actually adopted—letters sent before there was a rivet struck or a contract made. These letters should be made public, or if they were not placed on file, the reason for the latter course should be given. Again, of the Passaic class, represented now by the Passaic, Catskill, Montauk, Sangamon, Lehigh, Nantucket and Nahant, we shall be told why they have been allowed to deteriorate—by whose orders or by whose neglect. We believe that any fair investigation of these ironclads will show that these monitors need solid armor both on turret and sides, and probably new decks and new armor backing. Although built in six or eight months, and so long ago as in 1862, these little vessels of less than eight hundred tons were yet so skillfully planned as to be still valuable for harbor defence, in these days of enormous ocean-going ironclads. They are capable of being so armored as to cope successfully with the heaviest of existing naval guns; and their turrets could be easily made impregnable even to the twenty-five-ton guns of the Monarch.

Next we shall know what can be done with the monitors of the Canonicus class, seven or eight in number. These were made after the class already named, and yet they are not nearly as effective, the designs of the planner of our ironclad system not being carried out. It is worth while to inform the public why, with double the cost, this class proved less valuable than their predecessors, and why they were overloaded with extra weights, requiring a rebuilding in order to secure displacement enough to carry their "improvements."

Mr. ROBESON can then, probably, tell us from investigation, how we came to have the Kalamazoo class planned as it is. The Bureau of Construction and Repair can also, doubtless, explain how it is that nigh upon a million dollars were devoted to the so-called "trusses" of this class, and what admiration these devices have excited from practical bridge engineers for their wondrous utility for this purpose. And perhaps it will report, also, whether the function of the ships is to hold the trusses together, or that of the trusses is to hold the ships together. And we shall be very likely to hear, also, how it was that eight boilers were made for each of these ships, and it was then found they could carry but six.

The country is extremely anxious to know who the naval geniuses are to whom we are indebted for the present magnificent condition of our ironclads. It is such information, if made public, that will give to Mr. MORTON'S resolution the importance we attach to it.

The Bininger Case—A Conflict Avoided.

There now seems less probability of a conflict between Judge MCCUNN and the Federal Courts in the Bininger case. Judge BLATCHFORD has decided that Mr. CLARK, who was the plaintiff in the suit in the Superior Court, must allow the assignee in bankruptcy to conduct that suit in his own name, must give the necessary papers to substitute the assignee as plaintiff in his stead and must in no way interfere with the suit henceforth, and inasmuch as CLARK is subject to the jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court, his obedience to this decision can be enforced by punishment. If he obeys the order and executes the necessary papers, it is hardly to be expected that the Superior Court will refuse to make the necessary orders in that suit to substitute the assignee as plaintiff in CLARK'S place. And when he is so substituted as plaintiff, it is and the consultant should agree to discontinue the action, how could it be kept alive? The receivers would of course be able to keep the property until their fees were paid. Creditors might possibly apply to the Court to prevent the discontinuance of the suit without payment of their claims. But most of the creditors have already proved their claims in the bankruptcy proceedings, and they will possibly prefer to have the affairs closed up in the Bankruptcy Court. And if the creditors are contented and the receivers' claims are satisfied, and the parties to the suit consent, it will not be easy for Judge MCCUNN to keep the litigation in his Court.

New Educational System for England.

Not long ago Mr. BRIGHT asked the indulgence of the British public for the Government of which he is a member, by stating that it was as impossible to pass in one session all the great measures that were expected of them as it would be to drive six omnibuses abreast through the narrow gateway of Temple Bar. At the present rate of progress, however, the Gladstone Cabinet may prove better than its promises. No sooner have the provisions of the Irish Land bill been submitted to the House of Commons, than we find Mr. FORSTER, who in everything but in name is the Minister of Education, bringing forward a measure whose importance may be estimated from the pressing necessity which is acknowledged to exist for its enforcement.

The telegraphic summary of the new Education bill is of too meagre a character to enable us to form a very precise idea of its details. How it meets the religious difficulty is a point on which we are without any information. Enough is said, however, to show that the measure partakes of the character of a compromise between what are known as the rival schemes of Birmingham and Manchester. It proposes to remedy existing educational destitution by a careful division of the whole country into districts, in which the proportion between schools and population is to be ascertained by Government inspection. The amount of money to be given from the National Treasury can thus be determined, and where a sufficiency of local funds is not forthcoming to supplement it, compulsory rates are to be imposed for this purpose. Whether attendance is to be made compulsory or not, we are not informed.

The way in which the bill appears to halt between free and paid instruction, will probably materially interfere with its usefulness. It sounds, perhaps, reasonable enough to say that parents, when able, ought to contribute a certain amount of the school pence, but the experiences of English public schools has fully demonstrated the danger of bringing any social distinction, however slight, into the classroom. The presence of paying and non-paying pupils in the same school would, in a country like England, where caste distinctions are as powerful among the poor as among the rich, be a source of endless irritation and misrule. Such defects may be modified before the bill becomes law; meanwhile there can be no doubt that its provisions are a vast improvement on the existing system, which Mr. FORSTER has rightly characterized as "deplorable."

The probability of a compromise between the Democratic factions is said to be increased by a recent vigorous application of "the screw." It is well known that among the treasures in the District-Attorney's office there is a number of indictments against the class which we may denominate "political criminals." While the culprits are obedient to the party lash, these indictments are allowed to sleep—regard for public law or order being of course an entirely unimportant consideration. When, on the other hand, there is any symptom exhibited of a rebellious spirit, the accommodating District-Attorney unlocks his pigeon holes, and the bolt of justice is launched at the offender's head. This is the plan now adopted to quell the mutiny against Tammany. One of Senator NORTON'S friends, it is reported, has been brought up under an old indictment, and sent to the State Prison for ten years,—as a warning to others. This is "war to the knife" with a vengeance. A man cannot be expected to make a sacrifice of his liberty for the sake of his political convictions. To be sure, the whole system renders the law a mere instrument for personal and party services. But we are used to that. Does not even the World admit that Democrats have "put up Judges in the very Court Houses to sell injustice for a price?"

To-day "JACK REYNOLDS," alias Sylvester Breen, is again to be brought up for trial. It is a case in which it is most necessary that justice should be promptly vindicated. We have laws and the Judges have the solemn duty resting upon them of administering those laws without fear or favor. All we ask in reference to this particular case is that it shall not be postponed indefinitely by that kind of trickery of which the public have had a surfeit. If the prisoner's counsel is still ill this morning, the Judge has it within his power to appoint another advocate, and we have confidence that he will deem it to be his duty to follow that course. It would be difficult to stir up any sympathy in the public mind for REYNOLDS, for he sent an unoffending man to his account without a moment's warning—whereas the murderer is at least allowed time for repentance. Mr. TOWNSEND was not permitted to utter a prayer, or to bid farewell to his wife and children. This, then, is a case in which we have a right to demand that the criminal be brought to trial. Let him be fairly and impartially tried—we ask no more. But let us not have another example of the manner in which Courts of Justice may be turned into a laughing stock by contemptible artifices or plots

There has perhaps never been an instance of resistance to extortion which deserves so much applause as the league of the hotel keepers against the ice companies. With an effrontery which has seldom been surpassed, the ice companies gave notice that they would increase their prices fifty per cent. There was not the slightest excuse for such an advance. If ice was not forming in New-York streets, there was and is any quantity to be had a little way off. People might have supposed that the City had suddenly been transported to the tropics. The threatened advance deserves no other name than a conspiracy, and in self defence the hotel keapers are going to organize an independent company. Let them supply private citizens with ice—they would find it pay them well. The existing ice companies, with their "steel and deliver" policy, can soon be put to the right about. In the mean time we may expect signal outbreaks of public spirit equal to the last more good than the old plan of inserting the newspapers to flood the market.

It seems to be quite evident already that the new Irish Land bill introduced into the House of Commons will not satisfy the people of Ireland. It is a suspicious fact that English journals of strong Conservative tendencies concur in praising the bill. The Times and the Saturday Review both like it very much, while the Standard itself has no great objection to offer. These circumstances prepare us to learn that the Irish national Press denounces the bill. We do not believe, as we have often maintained during the last four or five years over which the revived discussion has extended, that any measure in the nature of a compromise will be acceptable to the Irish people. Yet what can Mr. GLADSTONE offer better than a compromise? He cannot satisfy the demands of the disaffected Irish. Do what he may, they will still rebel. Hence his success in dealing with the problem he has undertaken is a little more than doubtful, and a combination of the Conservatives with the Irish party may yet place him in a minority this session—startling as that phenomenon would be to the Liberal Party.

To have a "grand funeral" seems to be the highest ambition of many of our fellow-citizens, and there are frequent opportunities every Sunday of seeing what the ambition leads to. A long procession is formed, the face of the dead is exposed under glass, the coffin itself is made as conspicuous as possible, a band of music is hired—and with that kind of show the poor remains of mortality are carried to the grave. It would be a dreadful thought to most persons that they were not to be left in peace after life was gone—that death itself was to be made the subject of a ghastly spectacle. But as this is only a matter of taste, it would not be worth while to dwell upon it. The "practical" objection to these "fine funerals" is the sum of money which is wasted on them. A poor man who happens to belong to societies or political organizations, may be buried at an expense of from $500 to $1,000, or even more. Would it not be far better to give the greater part of the money to the widow and children? It is tolerably well understood that all the bands and processions in the world cannot impart one thrill of pleasure or ray of comfort to the thing which is buried Why vulgarize death only to impoverish the living?

The public have not forgotten the Methodist Book Concern. Here is an institution on which a large amount of money is spent, so managed that extensive defalcations are allowed, and prominent Methodists themselves, in the foolish hope of "hushing up" a scandal, let the defaulters go unpunished. What security can there be, under such circumstances, against the disclosure of a still greater scandal some day or other? The Methodist Committees have acted most unwisely in this affair. We learn from the Methodist that instead of seeking to find out the guilty persons, the last Committee tried to injure one of the gentlemen who is presumed to have brought the offences to light. We read, "two days were spent in an effort to find ground for suspending Dr. LANAHAN, and even after the effort was given up, a committeeman would now and then speak of returning to their 'original purpose.'" In the face of these facts, how can the great body of Methodists be expected to have any confidence in the management of the Book Concern?

One of the magazines very properly calls attention to the wanton destruction of small birds which is still tolerated in many parts of this country. These birds are among the best friends the farmer can have, and yet it is thought no harm to massacre them indiscriminately. In Massachusetts a measure has passed the Legislature encouraging the destruction of gulls and terns—birds which, as the writer says, are very valuable to the fisherman "for the important indications they give of the presence of certain kinds of fish, as also to the sailor, whom they warn in thick weather of the dangerous reef or the treacherous shoal." The same foolish and barbarous spirit is too often shown in other States. Small birds are blessings, and not a plague, to mankind. Since we have had the sparrows in this City no one has been annoyed by that old nuisance—the constant shower of worms from the trees in the streets. The sparrows have kept the trees almost bare of our troublesome visitors. It is said that the cats in the parks are in turn fast thinning out the sparrows. Puss finds a preserve in every quarter of the City. If that be so, the houses erected for the birds will not be of much use, for soon they will all be driven out into the wide world.

AMUSEMENTS.

Miscellaneous Announcements.

"Rigoletto" is to be sung at the Academy of Music, for the last time, to-night....Mr. FALCONER'S new drama of "Innisfallen; or the Men in the Gap," is to be acted at Niblo's, for the first time in this City, this evening. Mr. and Mrs. BARNEY WILLIAMS, who have not been heard at Niblo's for five years, fill the leading parts in the play. There seems no reason to doubt that the prosperity of the house will be maintained by the influence of the new piece, and of the popular artists we have named. Mr. FALCONER'S Irish dramas are entertaining at least, and his newest is said to be unusually interesting. From the plot lying before us it is evident that the matter is not of the freshest kind, but that the treatment is clever. The author, in a preliminary manifesto, expresses his desire to illustrate in his work "a mingling of the romantic and the real, of the unusual and extraordinary, with the common incidents of the every-day life of this age, which we may reasonably accept as one of the results of the disruption of social ties, the upheaving of society caused by political differences between neighbor nationalities, and an attempt at insurrection upon the part of a people. But from the location of the action, from which it is to be presumed the drama takes its title, and the adoption by way of a motto of MOORE'S laudatory and tenderly conceived apostrophe, it will be understood that the political element is poetically colored and made subsidiary to the development of a plot of purely domestic interest, appealing more directly to the hearts, the affections and sentiments, than to the passions and prejudices of the auditors." Without dealing at greater length with Mr. FALCONER'S announcement, we excerpt from it the fact that in addition to Mr. and Mrs. WILLIAMS, Mr. C. R. THORNE, Jr., and Mr. J. B. STUDLEY are to figure in "Innisfallen," and that during its progress a panorama of the Lakes of Killarney, painted by TELBIN, will be exhibited....Miss HENRIETTA MARKSTEIN, with numerous associates, gives a concert at Association Hall.... Harts's Bijou Theatre is to be opened to the public this evening....Miss FANNY HERRING commences, to-night, a brief engagement at the Bowery.

The meeting to be held at Cooper Institute to-night should be such as to convince the Legislature that the great body of the people earnestly desire that the State should make adequate provision at once for the care and maintenance of our sick and disabled soldiers. There is no room to doubt that such is the fact, and it is a duty which our citizens owe to themselves as well as to the veterans, to make it manifest by their presence and applause.

EUROPEAN MAIL NEWS.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP CITY OF BROOKLYN.

The Inman steamship City of Brooklyn, which left Liverpool Feb. 10, and Queenstown Feb. 11, arrived at this port last night. Her advices are later by three days than those at hand by the Main. The letters and papers embodying them were received at this office at 2:15 this A. M. The Queen's address to Parliament was the principal topic of comment in England. The address (received by cable) has already been printed in the TIMES with perfect accuracy, so that a republication of its text from the news papers would be quite superfluous.

ENGLISH AFFAIRS.

Advent of Spring—Work of Legislation—Workingmen as Lawmakers—The Education Question—Music for the Million.

From Our Own Correspondent.

LONDON, Saturday, Feb. 5, 1870.

Spring seems to have fairly opened upon us with light, music, fragrance and fullness of life. It seems more delightful here than elsewhere, because an English Winter is very gloomy. The English officers were enchanted with their first view of Portland, glittering with icicles, under a blue sky and bright sunshine. An English lady writes in ecstasy of sleighing in New-York. But an English Spring is also very charming.

WORK OF LEGISLATION.

Parliament meets in a few days. Earl DERBY has paid a visit to Mr. DISRAELI, with whom he is very friendly, but he could not be prevailed upon to take the conservative leadership in the Lords. The care of an immense estate presses upon him. The hard times in Lancashire, so many towns of which are his property, must occupy his mind. He is too liberal, perhaps, for the bulk of the party, and can do violence neither to the traditions of his family nor his own convictions—so Lord CAIRNS accepts the provisional leadership.

It is not of much use to speculate on the course of legislation, for you will have the Queen's speech, as the usual Ministerial programme is called, before this can reach you. The ballot will be adopted, and a most ingenious machine has been invented to work it with. The voter steps into a box; the door closes behind him. Then, in perfect security, he drops balls into tubes. The votes are registered by machinery; another door opens, and he comes out. No one knows how he has voted—he cannot prove how he voted himself. He cannot give an extra vote. Supposing he is the right man, and will not vote again, the system is perfect. With a slight improvement the voter might be entirely dispensed with, and Parliament elected by machinery. With another improvement, each member or each district might telegraph its vote, and no one would be required but the Speaker in his big wig, the Clerks in their small wigs, and the Speaker's Chaplain to read prayers for him every day at 4 o'clock before the public are admitted.

WORKINGMEN IN PARLIAMENT.

As the period for the election of a member of Parliament for Southwark draws nigh, in consequence of the appointment of Mr. LAYARD as Minister to Spain, the contest between the two Liberal candidates, Sir SIDNEY WATERLOW, capitalist and London tradesman, and Mr. ODGER, workingman, grows violent and disorderly. On Wednesday night a meeting of printers was called to consider the relative fitness of the candidates, and from the high intelligence of the craft, the most admirable results were anticipated. Printers, if any class, should be able to calmly discuss political differences, and decide them in a fair and orderly manner—so as to justify the demands for an educated body of electors. I am sorry to say that these reasonable expectations were disappointed. The London printers behaved worse than so many shoemakers or tailors. The hall, a large one, used for a Bicycle Academy, and which may have had some mysterious and malign influence, was densely crowded by about equal numbers of the friends of ODGER and WATERLOW. The Odgerites proposed to have Mr. APPLEGARTH take the chair. The Waterlowians wanted Mr. CONIBERE. This was the first fight, and in a few minutes Mr. CONIBERE was pitched from the platform and out of the room, and taken in a fainting condition to the nearest public house. This produced the wildest excitement. No speaking was possible on either side.

"The place was crowded from end to end, and, destitute as it is of any kind of ventilation, was literally suffocating. Cheers and counter cheers—first for 'Waterlow,' then for 'Odger'—were continuously raised, until the excitement reached such a pitch, owing in a great measure to the close containing of the two parties, that men began to fight. There were at least a dozen battles, and almost in every case blood was split. The platform was built of loose timber, and what with the crowding upon it and the heavy siege to which it was subjected, it fairly rocked again. To guard against the consequences of what is known as an ugly rush, the windows at the further end of the room had been covered with stout wood planking. This wood was torn away, and hurled by some one on the platform over the heads of the people. By those against whom it was levelled it was quickly sent into splinters, which were made to fly about in a most alarming fashion. The glass in the windows was smashed. The table on the platform was crushed into the consistence of match-wood. Fighting became general; those who had taken refuge on the platform were glad to make their escape from it; very many in fear fought their way out of the place; and the shouting, confusion and riot made up the incidents of a really alarming scene."

I have copied the above from a friendly report, which adds that a resolution was passed in favor of Mr. ODGER, with which no doubt he will be highly gratified; but really, when the élite of the working classes—the men who work the very engine of civilization, and compose, impose, set up and distribute the elements of science and literature—go on in that way, what are we to expect of the ruder elements. I should like to see Mr. ODGER elected. He has worked very hard and a long time for it. He has been set aside for this and that notability, and has but a small chance now, in these hard times, against a man with plenty of money. And Sir SIDNEY, it must be said, has strong claims upon the workingmen also, for he has led the way in providing good houses for them to live in. If Mr. ODGER gets into the House, I fear he will not find it comfortable. It is a club, and its members may give him the cold shoulder, though they may not be able to blackball him. He will have to be elected, and then supported, by contributions; and the feeling of the House is against hired representatives. The House of Commons will not think of payment for members, mileage, or even a franking privilege. They serve their country for honor, and honor alone, and pay even from £5,000 to £10,000 at an election, and large sums besides in contributions to charities for the privilege of doing so. The House is made up mainly of the noble and the rich—"young Lords and elderly soap boilers," the Saturday said; and they may give a wide berth to Mr. ODGER, if he ever comes into their charmed circle. Even Mr. BRIGHT did all he could at Birmingham to keep him and all such out of the Commons.

In considering the position of the workingman in this country, it is necessary to look not only at his present condition but his antecedents. In a new country like America, where everything is exceptional and progress is very rapid indeed, great changes can be effected in a moment—per saltum. The slave of yesterday may become the master of to-morrow—Legislator, Senator, President, perhaps; who knows? But here it takes time. It is barely seventy years since the coal miners of the north of England ceased to be slaves. Before the act of 1775, completed in 1799, the miners were bound to the pit in which they worked, and transferred with it. Tramps and vagabonds were sentenced to the collieries and sank pits for life, each with a collar rivetted round his or her neck, so that they could be returned like stray dogs if they escaped.

Even after 1797, although nominally free, the Scottish miners remained practically in a state of servitude. Till within twenty-six years women performed a large proportion of the underground work. One girl of 17 years of age told the Commissioners of 1842 that she had repeatedly labored for twenty-four hours in the pits, and after two hours of rest and some pens soup, returned for a second spell of twelve hours. In another pit, a girl only 6 years old was accustomed to [illegible] journeys a day, carrying half a hundredweight of coal, each journey being equal to an ascent to the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral. In this country it will take time to educate such people and make them free, independent and intelligent electors. The agricultural laborers are not a bit more hopeful.

Mr. ROBERT CONINGSBY, who, I believe, is somewhat known in America, wished to represent Southwark, but, finding there was no chance for him, withdrew, and he thinks Mr. ODGER would do well to follow his example. He thinks the spectacle of a workingman talking himself into power, will have a bad influence on his fellow workmen. And it would be against discipline, which is one of the conditions of success. Mind should direct body in all departments. Mr. ODGER proposes to represent muscle, but we do not want muscle to rule us. Brain alone should rule.

"When day laborers shall sit in Parliament," says Mr. CONINGSBY, "our 'golden youth' will begin to do as their French and American brethren do already—they will eschew politics to their own and the nation's loss. With workingmen in the House, a fight between classes must only be a question of time, and I will say frankly that it is because I know that in that fight, whenever it comes, the weaker will go to the wall—for the brute force of the poor is always to be bought by the rich—that, in the interests of those whose sufferings I know so well, I would lift up my feeble voice against this suicidal policy, which a minority of mistaken workmen, aided by some of the crotchety rich, would force upon their brethren."

And so Mr. CONINGSBY, in behalf of his side of the trades' unions, protests against workmen for representatives, and will vote for money, instead of muscle, in the person of the City Knight, Sir SIDNEY WATERLOW.

THE EDUCATION QUESTION.

But the question of education is too urgent to be postponed. Union and League are agreed that the education of the people is a political necessity, and Parliament will be very strongly urged to create a Department of Education, with a responsible Minister at its head. The religious difficulty will be got over by compromise; the difficulty of enforcing compulsion will be left to find its remedy in that apathy which allows so many laws to be evaded. Drunkenness is unlawful; so is vagabondage; so is prostitution. Parliament has at some time, I presume, enacted the ten commandments; but there are several of them for breaking which no one has been indicted in my remembrance. It will not be possible for any force of law to compel all parents to educate their children, or to make all children learn.

But the whole country has since the Paris Exhibition come to the conviction expressed a few days ago by Dr. LYON PLAYFAIR, M. P., that "the industrial supremacy of England is endangered for lack of knowledge, in spite of the practical aptitudes of the people."

The factory system, steam and machinery have changed the whole face of civilization.

"No wonder," says Professor PLAYFAIR, "that with this rapid change of conditions, loud cries of distress came from uneducated laborers who knew nothing except their acquired handicraft. No wonder that even now astonishment and consternation exist among like laborers, who see industries failing, and yet hope to preserve them by protective laws. * * * No nation can remain in a condition of permanent prosperity that does not give to its population as full an intelligence and as high an intellectual life as all other competing nations. * * * To show how little the raw material of manufacture compares in value with the skill and intellect applied to its production, I may mention that Switzerland imports cotton from America, and sends it back again across the ocean in a manufactured state, so as to undersell the products of the American mills. In like manner she imports tobacco from Havanna, and, making it into cigars, undersells the indigenous country in the South American markets. What has enabled this little nation, so remote from the pathways of commerce and so poor in the mineral resources of industry, to carry on manufacturing production by the aid of a prosperous and contented people, while England, washed by the ocean and abounding in mineral wealth, is burdened with an ever-increasing proportion of the unproductive poor? There is only one answer, that Switzerland has a highly-educated people.... The Coventry ribbon trade, which has deserted England, has settled itself in the valleys of Switzerland. The ribbon trade of Switzerland is prosperous and increasing, having an annual value of £1,600,000, most of which is exported, while the Macclesfield and Coventry trade, languishing and puning, has its exports represented by £61,000. The difference between the Swiss trade and the Coventry trade is very simple; it is involved in the answer given by OPIE, the painter, to a youth who asked him how he mixed his colors; 'I mix them with my brains, Sir!' In the one, high science and art superintend every branch of the industry, and a trained intelligence sits at the loom. In the other, the first is represented by a practical empiricism, the latter by ignorance."

I give you the cream of this lecture, because it may have some local application, even to the smartest nation in all creation. It is absurd, no doubt, to talk as Professor PLAYFAIR does of any of the wretched, downtrodden nations of Europe being superior to Americans in education, but it is necessary, to prevent the English getting entirely discouraged, to make out that there are people somewhere in the world nearly or quite as ignorant as themselves.

What is needed for England is, first, universal education in the elements of learning, and then scientific, technical and art education for those who show the ability to acquire it. The great masters of industry in France, and I presume it is the same elsewhere, educate with the greatest care all the persons they employ, and whenever they discover any sign of special talent they give it the best encouragement and culture. If an apprentice boy or a workman can contrive any improvement or hit upon any discovery, his reward is sure. Just as a soldier is decorated and promoted for courage and conduct, the artisan has his honors and rewards.

The Workingman's International Exhibition in London, now in course of organization, will be a step in the right direction, for every article will bear the name, not only of the manufacturing house which produces it, but of the artisan by whom it was made. Under this system it will not be a question of how to get the most wages for the least work, but how each man can do his best in the spirit of all true art and work—in the spirit also of honesty and fair dealing. And the revival of this spirit, is, perhaps, the first condition of prosperity.

And education, it is believed by some, will not only secure prosperity but diminish taxation. For instance, it now costs £2,500,000 a year to make ignorant recruits into good soldiers, and no one pretends that they are respectable then; a compulsory education would save a million a year in this item. After the establishment of compulsory education in Prussia, in twelve years crime and pauperism diminished forty per cent. If the same result were shown in England, there would be saving of six millions. But why estimate in pounds, shillings and pence the value of an educated, cultivated people, able to hold their way in the world, fearing no competition, with vice, crime, disease and misery reduced to their lowest mortal minimum? It is, however, time to begin. Berlin, the capital of of Prussia, has thirteen thousand persons receiving a scientific education. In Cambridge, England, there is an excellent school of art, but no students—the town artisans will not even take the trouble to attend it.

There is one point in the English system of education which may be worthy of attention—the principle of paying for results. For example: The Education Committee of the Privy Council pays the teacher of every Government aided school one shilling and four pence for every pupil who passes in music to the satisfaction of the inspector. One teacher in Wales the other day received £40 gold on this one item—and music is so far from being a hindrance that it is a rest and recreation, after the fatigues of other kinds of intellectual labor. I ask any literary man who happens to be musical to try it. Place a good pianoforte or one of the beautiful American organs—I only wish I had one—near the writing desk, and turn to it when tired of reading or writing; or take up a good violin if you like it, and see what rest and refreshment. To have some one to play to you, at home or elsewhere, is not bad either. But music should be a part of education for every one has an ear for it.

MONADNOCK.

Curious Geological Formation.

It is stated by one of our foreign exchanges that near the City of Medina, in Italy, and about four miles around it, wherever the earth is dug, when the workman arrive at a distance of sixty-three feet they come to a bed of chalk, which they bore with an auger, five feet deep. They then withdraw from the pit before the auger is removed, and upon its extraction the water bursts up through the aperture with great violence, and quickly fills the newly-made well, which continues full, and is effected by neither rains nor drought. But what is most remarkable in this operation is the layers of earth as they descend. At the depth of fourteen feet are found the ruins of an ancient city, paved streets, houses, doors, and different pieces of money. Then is found the wood of a forest, with all their woods, which was as great as ours is, they were blinded with vice and error. The most eminent men of Pagan civilization stumbled over the very elementary principles of even natural religion. LYCURGUS of Sparta, great as he was, decreed it to be the duty of parents to expose to the ravages of wild beasts such of their children as were not likely to turn out to be good soldiers, and this same diabolical practice is prevalent in China to-day. SOCRATES, it is true, taught some things that were excellent in themselves; but he saw only the mere surface of virtue. It remained for the Divine Teacher of old to inform mankind that cleansing the fountain is the only way of purifying the streams. The apothegm of the Grecian philosopher, "know thyself," lost its hold on mankind long before Christ came on earth to teach this in its highest and most ennobling sense. Men fail in this because they turn their backs on Christ and give no heed to His Divine admonitions. The reign of terror in France showed us how far it is possible for man to fall when left to himself unaided by Divine grace; and the aggregated horrors of that demoniac period form a warning tablet hung out against the sky, inscribed, "Let nations beware how they insult God and defy His Majesty!" The speaker then alluded to the Atheistic philosophy which is being spread over this country, and warned the Catholic community against it. The prosperity of the Catholic Church here, he said, is bound up in the education of her youth. She knows full well that the only safety for any people in a Christian country is to have education and religion go hand in hand. National character depends on the moral worth of the individuals composing the State, and moral worth is due solely to the abiding influence of religious precept. Where the virtues of religious faith do not abound, there is no real magnificence of character. Honor, truth and sincerity are indispensable to real national happiness, and these can only be inflexibly maintained by the inculcation of religious principle. The speaker here quoted from GUIZOT, the eminent French Protestant statesman, in support of the view that education, in order to become really beneficial to any nation, must be founded on religion. Man must be trained in his compound character as a moral and a religious, as well as an intellectual being. It is against the severance of these two components in the education of youth that the Catholic Church protests. "Go ye, teach," is a command given to the Church of God, and it is both anterior to and superior to all human law. In view of this command it will not do to prescribe the rights of man and discard the rights of God. He then set forth the objections entertained by Catholics against the present public school system. Catholic parents could not admit that six days in the week their children should have no reminder of their duty to God, and that a single hour of instruction in the Sunday School is sufficient to teach the child his full duty as a moral and religious being. They objected to the present system because by means of it the religious faith of their children is in danger of being weakened; because it set up no barrier against proselytism or positive infidelity. They desired to educate their own children (none others) because they did not believe a mere education of the intellect was capable of fitting them for their eternal hereafter. They could not admit that a system of education which adorns the walls of its school rooms with statues of Venus and Bacchus, but has no place for the images of our crucified Redeemer and his blessed Mother can be the system under which Christian parents ought to submit their children unreservedly, especially in these times of free thinking and indifferentism. It is for this reason that the Tenth Provincial Council of Baltimore recommended the Catholics of this country to erect schools for the education of their children, wherein they might be taught their duty to God as well as their duty to society. The speaker contended also that the present system was actually unfair in its operations to wards Catholics and Hebrews especially. It was practically a religious inequality to compel Catholics to contribute to the support of a system of instruction to which they could not in conscience intrust their children. He contended that there was no desire on the part of that Church to break up the common school system. If the State decreed that education must be provided for all its children, the Catholic Church would not object; only she asked that, in the imparting of instruction, the fundamental principles of Christianity should be, for her children at least, the first and not the last thing to be considered.

Bishop Southgate on the "Midnight Mission."

At Christ Church, Fifth-avenue and Thirty-fifth-street, last evening, Right Rev. HORATIO SOUTHGATE, late Bishop of Constantinople preached on behalf of the "Midnight Mission." Commencing with the words of Christ, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest," he said that the object of this institution was to afford a home where the penitent "fallen women" of this City might be received and sheltered from the dangers which beset them. This house is in Amity-street, and was first opened in 1867. Since that time 399 females have entered it—77 the first year, 122 the second, and 200 the third. Ninety-three of these were sent to hospitals and other charitable institutions; therefore their record is not upon the books of the Mission. Sixty-four were admitted for temporary shelter only, and nine have been lost sight of altogether. But of the remaining 233 the preacher gave the following account: Fifty-nine have been thoroughly reformed and restored to their homes; seventy now are employed in places of trust in different parts of the City and its vicinity; eighty-four have fallen back to the haunts of shame and degradation; twenty remain in Midnight Mission. They are all very comfortable and happy. In fact, he said, there are few happier families than that dwelling at present beneath the roof of the Mission house. But it is too small, and will not accommodate half the persons who apply for admission. Since it was first put in operation, over 1,000 applicants have been turned away, simply because there was no room for them. Ten had to be denied admission last week, and fourteen the previous one. Now, in view of these facts, and as it is but following the example and mandate of Christ, Christians having the means should contribute sufficient money to fit up and carry on an establishment at least twice as large as that existing. They cannot refuse to aid in the work of redemption without putting themselves in opposition to the Saviour, who first showed the example of receiving and aiding the sinful woman of Capernaum. Be not like Simon the Pharisee, and turn aside from a penitent sinner, even though it be a woman on the town.

A Brutal Husband's Attack upon his Wife and Mother-in-law.

Yesterday afternoon a young man named WILLIAM CLARKE was arrested by Roundsman TEHAN for committing a brutal assault on his wife and her mother in Hudson City. The bruised appearance of the complainants proved the nature of their treatment. CLARKE'S mother-in-law, Mrs. O'BRIEN, a respectable-looking woman, appeared with her face much swollen and cut, and other parts of her person beaten black and blue; while her daughter, CLARKE'S wife, who is a very handsome and interesting-looking person, received a black eye and had a handful of hair torn from her head by her loving spouse. According to the statement of the witnesses, CLARKE married Mrs. O'BRIEN'S daughter a short time since contrary to the wishes of her parents, and about three weeks ago forsook her and went to board in Jersey City. Returning yesterday, he commenced his former cruelties on his wife, and her screams being heard, Mrs. O'BRIEN ran up to her room and found CLARKE in the act of belaboring his wife. Mrs. O'BRIEN remonstrated with him, when he immediately attacked her, and, after striking her several times on the face and pulling out her hair, threw her down stairs, whereby she sustained severe bruises on her cheek, arms and body. Roundsman TEHAN was attracted by the uproar in the house, and on entering was confronted by CLARKE, who attempted to strike him, but the officer soon had CLARKE handcuffed, and accompanied him to the Police Station, where he was locked up for examination before the Recorder this morning.

Last evening Rev. WILLIAM BUTLER, D. D., discoursed on the Methodist Missions in India, of which he is the founder, in the Methodist Episcopal Church, Allen-street. He said that on the 9th of April, 1856, he was commissioned by the American Methodist Missionary Society to proceed to London and take counsel with the Church missionaries there in reference to the portion of India he was to select as the scene of his labors, his desire being to take up some portion as his own especial charge, and to go beyond the bounds of existing missionary agencies, where the Gospel of Christ had not yet been preached. As the result of that conference, he selected the immense tract of country which is bounded by the Ganges on the south and west and the Himalayas on the north, and which contains a population of fifteen millions of human beings. On the 20th of August in the same year he sailed from Plimpton dock, and in due time landed in Madras. While determining on the success of his mission, he was not insensible of the immense difficulties which lay in the way of its accomplishment, and his first action was to ascertain a thorough knowledge of the characters and customs of those for whom he was to labor. This attained, his great object was to establish the principles of the Christian faith so that its fruits may show it was inborn of the heart, and not that theoretical knowledge of Christ which is contained in the mere profession of Protestantism. With his fellow laborers he commenced the work of Christ, combating with innumerable obstacles, braving the fatigue, the dangers of the Indian climate, the privations of hunger and the perils to their lives consequent upon their attacking of heathen idolatries and institutions, with a truly Christian spirit, and hesitating at nothing in their endeavors for the salvation of their fellow beings. For years they toiled, and the success of their work was evinced in the condition of the North of India at the present day. Lucknow, the centre of infidelity, and the chief seat of Indian power, was now their headquarters, and the religion of Christ was almost universally diffused through the whole nation. In their theological seminary they had fourteen native students, equal in every respect to those of any college in the world; they were educating 4,500 young men; had two orphanages, one for females, containing 700 inmates, and one for males, containing 100, numbers of whom were anxious to join the army of preachers. They had a printing establishment, through which they supplied them the Bible in their own language, the sermons of WESLEY and those other works for the advancement of their religious knowledge, and the faithful missionaries by their acts and lives were still fighting for and extending the Church of Christ. In no instance were missionary labors ever attended with more success, but they should not rest satisfied with what had been accomplished. The work was still going on, and with the assistance of the sympathetic and Christian people of the United States it would continue to do so to the salvation of souls and the glory of the Gospel of Christ.

Our Duty to the Poor—A Discourse by Rev. Dr. John Hall.

Rev. Dr. JOHN HALL preached last evening at the Fourth Presbyterian Church, on Thirty-fourth-street, near Sixth-avenue, for the aid and encouragement of the Young Men's Social and Benevolent Association of that Church. He spoke upon the duties which we owe to the poor, taking for his text the following words:

"And the rich and poor meet together, and the Lord is father of them all."—Proverbs, xxxii., 2.

In the first place he remarked at some length on the duty which the rich and the enlightened owe to the poor and the ignorant on account of their common origin and the universal brotherhood of the race. All mankind, he said, sprang from the same parents. Although some scientific men doubted the reliability of the account of the origin of the race given in the Book of Genesis, he believed that the soundest scholars were agreed that the human species sprung from a single pair. The differences which exist at present, he accounted for as the result of Church habits and other external influences operating through a long series of generations. All mankind are members of the same great family, and for that reason, if for no other, should relieve one another's wants and bear one another's burdens. Mankind, too, are brought together so that the condition of one part invariably affects the other. Self-interest and our own security should prompt us to elevate the low. We cannot avoid the contamination of vice. If we keep it from the front door, the servants will bring it in through the back door, and our only protection is to eradicate it altogether. And worst of all, the effects of crime and sin in the insensibility and indifference which results from its familiarity to the minds of the people. They may at first regard it with abhorrence, but its frequent repetition will beget a familiarity which blunts the moral senses and deadens the conscience. Again, the rich and the poor need to meet morally. They have the same nature, and are subject to the same temptations. They are also the objects of the same atonement, and should occupy the same spiritual plane. The effect would not be to do away with social distinctions. These are providential, and any effort to break them down will be ineffectual. It is by no means desirable, that human society should be a level devoid of all inequalities than that the surface of the earth should be a vast plain undiversified by hills and valleys. Now, for the elevation of the poor, an association of young men had been formed in this church. The work which they had undertaken was a noble one, and they were deserving of all encouragement. The speaker closed with an appeal to those youths to display energy and perseverance in their good work, and carry forward the labor of the church when their fathers had passed from the stage.

Attempted Murder in Jersey City.

About 4 o'clock yesterday morning, while Officer CONNOLLY was on duty in the vicinity of the Morris Canal basin, his attention was attracted by the cries of some person in danger in that direction. On hastening down he found a night watchman, named JAMES GARVEY, in an exhausted state, just after he had been rescued from drowning. GARVEY stated that about an hour earlier two boatmen from New-Brunswick, named WILLIAM MAHER and REUBEN SIMPSON, came up to boat No. 992, the property of the Morris Canal Company, and in care of the watchman. MAHER claimed the boat as his, and undertook to remove it to New-Brunswick, but was resisted by GARVEY. At length MAHER grew desperate at the watchman's refusal to relinquish his charge of the boat, caught hold of him, as is alleged, and cast him overboard into the basin. The two men then commenced towing the boat from its moorings, leaving GARVEY struggling in the water. After a time, however, MAHER'S confederate (SIMPSON) relented, and throwing a plank to the drowning watchman, conveyed him to the shore in a very prostrate condition. At this juncture Officer CONNOLLY came up, and discovering the state of affairs, took the trio to the Police Station, where MAHER confessed throwing GARVEY overboard. The watchman's wants were promptly attended to, and after changing his clothes and becoming revived he, in company with an officer, returned to the boat and hauled it back to the basin. The accused were locked up to await a hearing before the Recorder this morning. It appears that SIMPSON was only hired by MAHER to assist him in removing the boat to New-Brunswick.

Murderous Assault in Jersey City.

Shortly before midnight of Saturday a party of about twenty were carousing in BAILEY'S saloon, beneath the Darcy Buildings, in Jersey City, when a quarrel arose between several of the crowd, one of whom, named PATRICK EGAN, was struck, as is alleged, a terrible blow on the head with an iron belaying pin, in the hands of a man named JAMES CANFIELD. The injured man was carried home in a senseless condition, and his alleged assailant taken into custody. Yesterday afternoon the physician who attended EGAN having pronounced him out of danger, CANFIELD was admitted to bail to answer at the next term of Court. A brother to EGAN, named MICHAEL, procured the arrest of one EDWARD FLANNERY on a charge of assaulting him at the same time, but the evidence being insufficient to detain him, he was discharged yesterday morning.

Alleged Frauds on the Revenue.

On Saturday forenoon Messrs. KOHLER and KAMERA, brewers of Guttenberg, were arrested and arraigned before Commissioner HOFFMAN, of Hoboken, charged by a man named RICHARD DORES with violating the internal revenue laws, by taking from old lager beer kegs revenue stamps which had never been canceled and putting them on new kegs in such a manner that they could be taken off and used again. DORES testified that he has frequented the brewery for two years, and saw a barkeeper take the stamps off the kegs and put them in a drawer, and saw a Mr. HESS transfer stamps from one keg to another. Another witness, named JOHN EFFENS, swore that he bought beer of KOHLER & Co., and the kegs bore no stamps. Without proceeding further in the case the Commissioner bound the defendants in the sum of $5,000 each to appear for a further hearing on Saturday next.

The Coming Liederkranz Masquerade.

The masked ball of the Liederkranz Society will take place at the Academy of Music on the 24th inst. The Liederkranz is the largest and wealthiest German singing society of this country, and its masquerade promises to be one of the greatest affairs of the season. The main attraction will be a representation of the opening of the Suez Canal, in preparation for which a rehearsal was held at Liederkranz Hall, Nos. 31, 33 and 35 East Fourth-street, yesterday afternoon.

Another Shooting Affray in Brooklyn.

Yesterday morning, between 3 and 4 o'clock, a somewhat noisy party of roysterers entered an oyster saloon situated corner of Hamilton-avenue and Van Brunt-street, kept by THOMAS MCNAMARA. Drinks were, it appears, freely demanded and consumed, but a disposition was manifested to evade their payment. The saloon keeper alleges that the party proceeded to kick up a row, smashing his doors and windows and throwing about his oyster shells. He told them to stop, and on their failing to do so he drew a pistol and shot at and wounded a man named WILLIAM FRANCIS, who, he says, was the most inoffensive of the party. Shortly after MCNAMARA was arrested, and is detained for examination. The wounded man was conveyed to the Long Island Central Hospital. It was found that the ball had entered through the coat and vest, inflicting a flesh wound in his right side. He was able to walk home after having the wound, which was not a serious one, dressed at the Hospital.

A Catholic Priest on Sensational Preaching.

In St. Peter's Roman Catholic Church, Jersey City, yesterday, the pastor, Rev. Dr. CORRIGAN, preached from the text where the word of God is compared to a mustard seed, and after paraphrasing the Gospel and applying it to the spiritual necessities of his hearers in many of its phases, he took occasion to upbraid those Christians who have no other object in attending church than to hear mountebank preachers, who, though they may be eloquent, rhetorical and very elocutionary in their way, yet have no wisdom in their words. Such Christians only get the chaff, while the grain is withheld from them. And they in speaking of the merits of clergymen often remark that such a minister is a very amiable man, but a very poor preacher. Father CORRIGAN maintained that human eloquence was not indispensable in teaching the word of God, and it was moreover painful to hear church members reflect in such a manner on their ministers.

Sermon Before the Colored Young Men's Christian Association.

Last evening Rev. Mr. SPELMAN preached before the Colored Young Men's Christian Association at the Abyssinian Church, in Waverley-place. He took as his text the words applied to Josiah: "He did that which was right in the sight of God, and walked in the steps of his father David, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left." The preacher gave a review of the life of Josiah and the memorable events which occurred during his reign. He commenced, he said, by saying a Christian and a King as his pastors, and thus far he could say that he had done well. He exhorted the young men who listened to him to do as Josiah had done, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left. Thus they might become bright and shining examples, and lead many sinners from the errors of their ways into the true path. The preacher concluded by giving examples from his own experience of how a good example or a word spoken in season might benefit those who heard it.

The annual report of the Association was read, but it contained no statistics of membership, &c. A collection was taken up, and a prayer meeting was then held, after which the benediction was pronounced.

Christianity and Education—Lecture by Rev. Joseph P. Woods, of Morrisania.

Rev. Jos. P. WOODS, Pastor of St. Augustine's Church, Morrisania, lectured last evening in St. Joseph's Catholic Church, Sixth-avenue, in aid of the poor fund of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, connected with that church. The church was filled to repletion, admission being fixed at fifty cents per head. The reverend gentleman took for his subject "Christianity and Education." The terms "learning" and "education" were most generally confounded, nowadays, he said. "Learning" was not the whole of "education." The race of Abraham made their impress upon the world's history centuries before one of them even knew the alphabet. The aristocracy of wealth was not, in the speaker's opinion, to be held as of equal value with the aristocracy of mind. Once education was in charge only of the universities; they dealt it out by the ton, and only those who were wealthy could obtain it. Now it is dealt out in smaller parcels; and it is fortunate for us, in many ways, that we live in an age when the facilities for spreading education in society are so great. If education have a religious basis, it will advance society in truth, wisdom and prosperity; but if it have not, the State is exposed to all the storms of passion. It will not do to boast of mere intellectual progress. Greece and Rome no doubt boasted of their progress as greatly as we do of ours to-day; yet with all this, with all their wealth, which was as great as ours is, they were blinded with vice and error. The most eminent men of Pagan civilization stumbled over the very elementary principles of even natural religion. LYCURGUS of Sparta, great as he was, decreed it to be the duty of parents to expose to the ravages of wild beasts such of their children as were not likely to turn out to be good soldiers, and this same diabolical practice is prevalent in China to-day. SOCRATES, it is true, taught some things that were excellent in themselves; but he saw only the mere surface of virtue. It remained for the Divine Teacher of old to inform mankind that cleansing the fountain is the only way of purifying the streams. The apothegm of the Grecian philosopher, "know thyself," lost its hold on mankind long before Christ came on earth to teach this in its highest and most ennobling sense. Men fail in this because they turn their backs on Christ and give no heed to His Divine admonitions. The reign of terror in France showed us how far it is possible for man to fall when left to himself unaided by Divine grace; and the aggregated horrors of that demoniac period form a warning tablet hung out against the sky, inscribed, "Let nations beware how they insult God and defy His Majesty!" The speaker then alluded to the Atheistic philosophy which is being spread over this country, and warned the Catholic community against it. The prosperity of the Catholic Church here, he said, is bound up in the education of her youth. She knows full well that the only safety for any people in a Christian country is to have education and religion go hand in hand. National character depends on the moral worth of the individuals composing the State, and moral worth is due solely to the abiding influence of religious precept. Where the virtues of religious faith do not abound, there is no real magnificence of character. Honor, truth and sincerity are indispensable to real national happiness, and these can only be inflexibly maintained by the inculcation of religious principle. The speaker here quoted from GUIZOT, the eminent French Protestant statesman, in support of the view that education, in order to become really beneficial to any nation, must be founded on religion. Man must be trained in his compound character as a moral and a religious, as well as an intellectual being. It is against the severance of these two components in the education of youth that the Catholic Church protests. "Go ye, teach," is a command given to the Church of God, and it is both anterior to and superior to all human law. In view of this command it will not do to prescribe the rights of man and discard the rights of God. He then set forth the objections entertained by Catholics against the present public school system. Catholic parents could not admit that six days in the week their children should have no reminder of their duty to God, and that a single hour of instruction in the Sunday School is sufficient to teach the child his full duty as a moral and religious being. They objected to the present system because by means of it the religious faith of their children is in danger of being weakened; because it set up no barrier against proselytism or positive infidelity. They desired to educate their own children (none others) because they did not believe a mere education of the intellect was capable of fitting them for their eternal hereafter. They could not admit that a system of education which adorns the walls of its school rooms with statues of Venus and Bacchus, but has no place for the images of our crucified Redeemer and his blessed Mother can be the system under which Christian parents ought to submit their children unreservedly, especially in these times of free thinking and indifferentism. It is for this reason that the Tenth Provincial Council of Baltimore recommended the Catholics of this country to erect schools for the education of their children, wherein they might be taught their duty to God as well as their duty to society. The speaker contended also that the present system was actually unfair in its operations to wards Catholics and Hebrews especially. It was practically a religious inequality to compel Catholics to contribute to the support of a system of instruction to which they could not in conscience intrust their children. He contended that there was no desire on the part of that Church to break up the common school system. If the State decreed that education must be provided for all its children, the Catholic Church would not object; only she asked that, in the imparting of instruction, the fundamental principles of Christianity should be, for her children at least, the first and not the last thing to be considered.

Bishop Southgate on the "Midnight Mission."

At Christ Church, Fifth-avenue and Thirty-fifth-street, last evening, Right Rev. HORATIO SOUTHGATE, late Bishop of Constantinople preached on behalf of the "Midnight Mission." Commencing with the words of Christ, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest," he said that the object of this institution was to afford a home where the penitent "fallen women" of this City might be received and sheltered from the dangers which beset them. This house is in Amity-street, and was first opened in 1867. Since that time 399 females have entered it—77 the first year, 122 the second, and 200 the third. Ninety-three of these were sent to hospitals and other charitable institutions; therefore their record is not upon the books of the Mission. Sixty-four were admitted for temporary shelter only, and nine have been lost sight of altogether. But of the remaining 233 the preacher gave the following account: Fifty-nine have been thoroughly reformed and restored to their homes; seventy now are employed in places of trust in different parts of the City and its vicinity; eighty-four have fallen back to the haunts of shame and degradation; twenty remain in Midnight Mission. They are all very comfortable and happy. In fact, he said, there are few happier families than that dwelling at present beneath the roof of the Mission house. But it is too small, and will not accommodate half the persons who apply for admission. Since it was first put in operation, over 1,000 applicants have been turned away, simply because there was no room for them. Ten had to be denied admission last week, and fourteen the previous one. Now, in view of these facts, and as it is but following the example and mandate of Christ, Christians having the means should contribute sufficient money to fit up and carry on an establishment at least twice as large as that existing. They cannot refuse to aid in the work of redemption without putting themselves in opposition to the Saviour, who first showed the example of receiving and aiding the sinful woman of Capernaum. Be not like Simon the Pharisee, and turn aside from a penitent sinner, even though it be a woman on the town.

A Brutal Husband's Attack upon his Wife and Mother-in-law.

Yesterday afternoon a young man named WILLIAM CLARKE was arrested by Roundsman TEHAN for committing a brutal assault on his wife and her mother in Hudson City. The bruised appearance of the complainants proved the nature of their treatment. CLARKE'S mother-in-law, Mrs. O'BRIEN, a respectable-looking woman, appeared with her face much swollen and cut, and other parts of her person beaten black and blue; while her daughter, CLARKE'S wife, who is a very handsome and interesting-looking person, received a black eye and had a handful of hair torn from her head by her loving spouse. According to the statement of the witnesses, CLARKE married Mrs. O'BRIEN'S daughter a short time since contrary to the wishes of her parents, and about three weeks ago forsook her and went to board in Jersey City. Returning yesterday, he commenced his former cruelties on his wife, and her screams being heard, Mrs. O'BRIEN ran up to her room and found CLARKE in the act of belaboring his wife. Mrs. O'BRIEN remonstrated with him, when he immediately attacked her, and, after striking her several times on the face and pulling out her hair, threw her down stairs, whereby she sustained severe bruises on her cheek, arms and body. Roundsman TEHAN was attracted by the uproar in the house, and on entering was confronted by

Return of National Guards—Leave at Paraguay—Civil Marriages—Appreciation of the Chaco by Argentine Forces—Statement of Survivors of "25 de Mayo"—Colonization Schemes—Facts and Figures, &c., &c.

From Our Own Correspondent.

BUENOS AYRES, Thursday, Dec. 30, 1869.

The chief matter now occupying public attention is the return of the National Guards from Paraguay. Preparations have been made to receive them on a grand scale; arches, trophies, flags, illuminations, fireworks and the usual other accompaniments of triumphal marches having been ready for the last week or ten days. The delay in the arrival is owing to the low water in the rivers, which prevents the steamer from navigating up to the points of embarkation. According to the latest dispatches they ought to land here on Sunday or Monday next. Each National Guard is to receive 200 francs, besides a portion of the land appropriated by law for this purpose, and is to be held exempt from all military service for ten years.

News of a warlike nature is scarce. LOPEZ is reported at Panadero, intrenched with the remainder of his army, said by deserters to consist of three divisions of infantry of about 400 men each, and one division of cavalry numbering less than 200. This will make his whole force amount to less than 2,000 men. In addition to these soldiers, there are supposed to be one or two small divisions in other parts of the country, whose strength is unknown. The Indians of Caycus, upon whom LOPEZ was said to be relying, seem now to refuse their aid; if this be true, the state of affairs could not well be worse. In spite of all, the Tribuna correspondent, however, gives his opinion to the effect that so soon as the Allies withdraw from Asuncion, LOPEZ will reappear; to guard against which possibility, a force of about 8,000 will be left in Paraguay until the Provisional Government be strong enough to take care of itself, though the Argentine and Oriental troops will be withdrawn.

A grand meeting was held at Asuncion on the 19th inst., to consider the subject of civil marriage, which appears to be creating some stir in this part of the world, owing doubtless to the fact that this people are gradually desiring to throw off the priestly yoke which the rising generation does not seem to approve of. On the 17th inst. Major DIEMMO, acting under the orders of General MITRE, took possession of a large tract of the Chaco in the name of the Argentine Government. The part appropriated consists of the richest pasture, and will no doubt offer unusual advantages to the colonist so soon as LOPEZ is effectually disposed of.

The survivors of the Argentine war steamer "25 de Mayo," seized by LOPEZ at the commencement of the war, have published a statement contradicting an article of a New-York paper of some months back, to the effect that LOPEZ did not treat his prisoners badly—a statement which appears to have been grounded on MCMAHON's experience. The statement in question shows that MCMAHON was altogether unable to form a correct judgment, owing to the fact that he did not mingle with the Paraguayans, and was therefore ignorant of the manner in which prisoners were treated, which, by the above, is represented as brutal in the extreme. Montevideo seems on the eve of another revolution, this time General SUAREZ being the leader; but we have, this side, become so accustomed to our neighbor's alarms that but little attention is paid to these rumors. The affair between the Italian Consul and the Provisional Government, alluded to in my last, at Asuncion, appears to have been settled, the latter having very wisely seen fit to back out of the matter as best he could, without being too unbending.

Grand schemes are being mooted to colonize Concepcion del Uruguay, which district offers unusual advantages to the colonist, were it not for the country's unsettled state—the chief drawback to progress out here.

The number of sea-going vessels which have entered this port during the month is probably unprecedented; 220 entries are reported at the Custom House. In spite of this foreign trade, the port scheme, apparently launched under most favorable circumstances, appears now to have been almost lost sight of. As another proof of the strange progress made out here, the following figures may not prove uninteresting: Value of flour imported last year, $1,300,000; of sugar, $2,000,000; of boots and shoes, $900,000, and of salt, $200,000. Now flour and sugar might certainly be grown here to this little or no difficulty, and exists in any quantity at Bahia Blanca, while hides are sent home and reimported as leather!

The Post Office of this city seems the most progressive institution, the letters received during the month being 83,918; printed packages, 52,362; letters dispatched, 60,111; packages, 50,381; receipts of month, $9,062 gold.

The money market is now rather tight: from what cause it does not appear; probably it is ruled by a few of the millionaires. Produce seems inclined to a rise, as the recent advices from the States and Europe are still favorable.

Perilous Descent of an Aeronaut—His Balloon Wrecked.

The Augusta Constitutionist publishes an account, given by Professor S. A. KING, of a balloon ascension made by him from that city, on Wednesday afternoon, 9th inst. The cable was loosed at 4:15, and the wind being high he moved off rapidly in a northeasterly direction. At length it becoming dark, he found it necessary to descend, and the result of his attempt he tells as follows:

I now allowed the balloon to settle gradually, with the view of landing as soon as an opportunity offered. I floated along for some time, however, before a clearing came in my way, when this came at last in the shape of a field walled around by a thick wood. The rate of speed at which I was traveling, and the uncertainty with which height is measured by the eye in the absence of daylight, rendered it very difficult to effect a landing under such circumstances. The attempt was made, however, but without success, just touching the tree tops on the opposite side of the lot. I had one bag of ballast left. It was immediately thrown over, and kept the balloon out of a tree-top for a while, but it soon settled again and brushed the tops of five or six pines, causing it to rebound from fifty to one hundred feet. This brought to view another field just ahead, on which were a number of naked dead pines. To have the balloon impaled on one of these is probably the most dangerous position in which the aeronaut could be placed, and I would much rather have taken the chances among the green pines, at my ballast was gone. I quickly let go my drag rope, hoping to clear them by letting the rope drag instead of carrying its dead weight in the basket, but it was not enough, and in another moment the "Hyperion" dashed broadside against one of the tallest of these fiendish-looking skeletons for a while, and its limbs seemed to close around me. I was fastened in its arms; the sudden escape of all the gas must of course follow, and what then? I jumped on to the edge of the basket, seized the drag rope with my hands, took a turn around one leg, and the next moment would have been safe upon the ground; but the gas had escaped in less time than it took me to make my preparations, and with a crash the rotten limbs gave way, and the whole mass fell together. The distance from the ground must have been from fifty to sixty feet, and how I escaped with whole bones seems to me, at this moment, a miracle. The shock was terrible. I arose immediately to my feet, staggering about like a drunken man, and yet astonished that I was able to do so much. I soon regained strength, however, sufficient to enable me to reach a house near by, where I found some very intelligent colored people, who did all that lay in their power to render me the assistance I needed. I suffered much pain during the night, and did not pretend to sleep; but by Thursday afternoon I had so far recovered as to be able to see to the packing of the wreck of the balloon, and at 7 o'clock that evening I started in a wagon for Gourdin Station on the Northeastern Railroad, fifty miles from Charleston and eighteen miles from where I landed. The place of my descent was in the extreme southeastern portion of Clarendon County, S. C., on the plantation of Mrs. GEORGE B. GOLBY. On Friday morning I took the cars for Charleston, and left for Augusta the same evening. The trip in the balloon was made in about three hours and a half, and the distance made was less than 100 miles.

The Case of Sam Noble.

From the Binghamton Republican, Feb. 18.

E. P. HUNT, Esq., of Elmira, counsel for DAN NOBLE and MAGGIE DEWITT, has made a motion at a Special Term of the Supreme Court, to be argued the present week at Ithaca, before Judge BOARDMAN, for the unconditional discharge from the indictments pending against them and charging them with complicity in the Royal Insurance Company bond larceny. DAN NOBLE has been tried on the above charge three times, twice in Chemung County and once in Tioga County, the jury disagreeing on each trial. It was expected to bring NOBLE to a fourth trial at the next Oyer and Terminer, appointed to be held in Tioga County on the 28th inst. The motion to discharge is strongly opposed by the District-Attorney of Chemung County.

REAL ESTATE TRANSACTIONS.

Review of the Market for the Past Week.

There has been no material improvement in the real estate market during the week which has just past. An unusual number of auction sales for the present season took place at the Exchange Rooms, and Tuesday, especially, was a comparatively busy day, but this is no reliable criterion of the state of the market. Almost invariably the prices obtained at these public sales is smaller than those paid for property of the same kind similarly situated weeks months ago. In private transactions prices have remained remarkably firm until quite recently. Now, however, there is a slight disposition to give way. Owners have had their property so long in the market without getting sales that they are now beginning to yield. Some fine business property have suffered material decline, and those on dwellings are giving way somewhat.

The amount of public sales last week at the Exchange was $194,200 of City property and $15,500 of Brooklyn real estate. The number of transfers reported was 103, involving consideration to the amount of $1,237,000.

To day STANLEY DAY disposes of a house and lot on West Twenty-second-street, between Seventh and Eighth avenues. The house is four stories high with a brown-stone front, and is known as No. 205.

RECENT MURDERS.

The Lawlessness of Society and its Remedy.

Sermon by Rev. Dr. Storrs Yesterday—Impressive Comments on the Death of Mr. Voorhees.

Yesterday morning in the South Congregational Church, Court-street, Brooklyn, of which the late Mr. VOORHEES was a member, the pastor, Rev. Dr. STORRS, delivered a very impressive discourse on the symptoms of social miasma with special reference to the tragic event of the preceding Sunday. The devotional exercises and lessons of the day bore special reference to the uncertainty of human life. The text of the sermon was taken from Jeremiah ix., 21: "For death is come up into our windows, and is entered into our palaces, to cut off the children from without, the young men from the streets." The eloquent preacher opened his discourse as follows: The death of one person is commonly a matter of private interest. A single family, a narrow circle, will comprise all that are especially touched or affected by it. The community at large knows hardly more about it than is conveyed by the brief notice in the daily paper, or possibly some allusion in Sabbath worship. It is one of those facts which go to humble the pride of man and teach us our nothingness, that the world accommodates itself so easily to our loss, going forward in all the whirl of busy life, unconscious of our departure as ponderous machinery, whirling with prodigious might, crushes the insects which chance to light one moment upon the surface. But now and then circumstances seem to invest with a more public character what else were of simple private nature. This terminated life may have been peculiarly inwrought with society, or sense of its institutions. This occurrent death may have come in such shape as to carry in it lessons of public welfare and public duty. It may so reveal public conditions as to make it a fit and imperative theme for the Christian pulpit. Whatever its shape or breadth of relation, death is the transaction and voice of God—the disposer of life. It is always his word announcing to an immortal being that his probation for eternity is now terminated, and calling him to render his account, and therefore it is always a solemn event. Yet even here solemnity may be defined. When one man comes, in old age, like a shock of corn fully ripe, to his end, none lay it seriously to heart. That is simply natural. The sun, when now it has traversed the whole heaven from horizon to horizon, should sink behind the hills. It is the sudden blotting of that sun from the morning heavens that startles our mind as altogether unnatural. It seems only right that the long-desired hour should come to this wretched, bedridden, wasted victim of disease; but how unlike that the instant transformation of all the pride and power of full manly strength into the utter prostration of the lifeless corpse. To close our eyes and lie down amidst the tender watchings of faithful friendship, with the ministrations of religion on the ears, and clasping its blessed faith more sustainingly each moment to the heart, and then understandingly to wait with earnest desire the opening of eternity and heaven now just at hand—this is an experience where death is no longer death. It is not only disarmed and divested of its "terrors;" it seems also to lose much of its proper solemnity. But to be hurried by sudden shot or stroke, without an instant's warning, from eager life into the presence of God—surely this is something to reinvest it with all its awakening power over every heart. And when now the providence of God has brought such an assemblage of circumstances about any death, it becomes us to ponder the lessons, for it would seem He designs by such means to reclothe it with fearfulness. In the passage from which the text is taken, the Prophet, after deploring the general evil of his time, and tracing it up to its source in the low moral condition of the nation and its positive sin, goes on to speak of the judgments yet to follow. Violence, the deadly assault, the assassin's trade, should be no longer restricted to unfrequented ways, to the wilderness, and the secret or unguarded place. "Death is come up into our windows"—i. e. finds its victims in the midst of fancied safety. Doors closed and barred, they felt secure, but the murderer's hand had other ways of access, "and is entered into our palaces"—i. e. mounts up from the wonted field in the haunts of ignorant brutality, seeking those that move in higher walks, and striking them down amidst the protections of better life. "To cut off the children from without, i. e, those most anxiously protected, about whom their family and society would throw the shield of love with extremest care. The young men from the streets, i. e., the strongest, most self-reliant of these high-born, wealthier guarded ones "from the very streets"—the heart of policed and close-built cities—where they have walked in their strength and which they have adorned with their energy. This passage, then, I have chosen to-day because of the vivid conjunction and sympathy with those tragical events that, one after another, have recently and so rapidly been staining the houses and streets of these twin cities with human blood,—and one of which, taking a member of our own congregation, the past week has stirred this entire community and impressed it far more deeply than we have seen it before. I speak from the standpoint of no single event, but rather from that furnished by this rapid conveyance of so much bloody crime upon these few months. An equal amount spread over a term of years might not have so aroused the public mind. An equal number restricted altogether to the brutal class, would have called up less stern feeling and excited less question into cause and cure. The conviction is abroad and growing that something must be done, and done quickly, to abate this fearful onset of murderous violence. For what have we seen? Rather what have we not seen? Nothing seems sacred; nothing protected. The honest citizen of pure and irreproachable life, now full of years and Christian beneficence, is sweeping the morning snow from the front area of that home which has sheltered himself, his wife and his family these years, when he is set upon and stabbed to death—for what? Revenge? No, he had not an enemy. For what might chance to be in his pocket. The distinguished advocate, by virtue of long-tried devotion to the City's sanitary and other interests worthy of being called a public benefactor, returning to his house, and now within a few feet of it, beneath the full moon, is waylaid and left for dead by the hired instrument of secret hate. The faithful roundsman on the Police force, pacing his lonesome midnight vigil along the lighted streets for your safety and mine, is shot to death in the back for his fidelity, by the lurking miscreant whose hiding place he has just passed. The poor, honest, hard-working man, husband and father, toiling in humble poverty for his children's bread, aiming now to expel the ruffian that has invaded his home, is stabbed to the heart before the daughter who is willing to stay the fatal blow with her own life. But why continue the recital? Judicial authority, speaking from the Bench, asserts that no less than 300 brutal homicides have thus transpired in this Metropolitan District within the year just closed; whilst another high authority affirms—what, indeed, our own reading of the daily papers had already led us to believe—that murder now averages at least one victim per day. Within these limits; restricted to no one class, to no one grade of classes, to no one form, or time, or place, but spreading everywhere up and down; seeking its victims as well among the high-born, intelligent, wealthy—among those who hold themselves aloof and from scenes of brawl, dissipation and wickedness, as among those in other circles. It is not my thought so much to ask just now what has brought about this state of things, as to suggest what ought to be our effort, at least in two or three directions. The preacher then proceeded to an impressive enumeration of the Christian duty of invigorating the triple ideas of Divine retribution, of irresistible Divine law, and of an immediate Divine presence. Beyond other nations, he contended that we need the first grand safeguard of life which is provided by keeping alive these great truths. It is objected, e. g. that France with no such convictions yet shows no such statistics; that her people and Government are able to protect society against ferocity and terror without that aid I am now invoking. But the cases are not parallel. It is our privilege to incorporate with our body politic some of the best material out of the Old World. Many of our foremost men are its generous gift. But the moral dregs of Europe also are poured into our cup, and we are then called to treat not merely that amount of crime indigenous to forty millions of people, but what can be imported out of three hundred millions more. Our nation, unlike any other, is annually receiving into its unsuspicious and sheltering bosom a whole generation of vipers. It welcomes with a prodigality of kindness a mass of degraded brutality, sorted out of the criminal classes by social and physical laws which send here the most enterprising, the most reckless, and therefore the most dangerous. Arrived, they are amazed at their splendid immunity from surveillance; they are emboldened by their almost instant accession to the governing classes: they are strengthened by their easy [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] by [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] and
